

ENTERED AT THE POST OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AT SECOND CLASS MAIL RATES.

Vol. XXI.

Published Every Week.

Beadle & Adams, Publishers,
98 WILLIAM STREET, N. Y., December 5, 1883.

Ten Cents a Copy.
$5.00 a Year

No. 267

THE WHITE SQUAW.

BY CAPTAIN MAYNE REID,

AUTHOR OF "THE HEADLESS HORSEMAN," "THE DEATH-SHOT," "THE OCEAN HUNTERS," ETC., ETC.

ALICE, THE WHITE SQUAW.

The White Squaw.

A Tale of the Land of Flowers.

BY CAPT. MAYNE REID,

AUTHOR OF "THE SCALP-HUNTERS," "THE HEADLESS HORSEMAN," "THE HUNTERS' FEAST," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER I.

A DEADLY INTRODUCTION.

THE last golden gleams of the setting sun sparkled across the translucent waters of Tampa bay. His fading light fell upon shores fringed with groves of oak and magnolia, whose evergreen leaves became gradually darkened by the purple twilight.

A profound silence, broken by the occasional notes of a tree-frog, or the flapping of the night-hawk's wings, was but the prelude to that wonderful concert of animated Nature, heard only in the tropical forest.

A few moments, and the golden lines of trembling light had disappeared, while darkness almost palpable overshadowed the scene.

Then broke forth, in full chorus, the nocturnal voices of the forest.

The mocking-bird, the whippowil, the bittern, the bell frog, grasshoppers, wolves, and alligators, all joined in the harmony incident to the hour of night, causing a din startling to the ear of a stranger.

Now and then would occur an interval of silence, which rendered the renewal of the voices all the more observable.

During one of these pauses, a cry might have been heard differing from all the other sounds.

It was the voice of a human being! And there was one who heard it.

Making his way through the woods was a young man dressed in half hunter costume, and carrying a rifle in his hand. The cry had caused him to stop suddenly in his tracks.

After glancing cautiously around, as if endeavoring to pierce the thick darkness, he again advanced, and again came to a stop, and remained listening. Once more came that cry, in which accents of anger were strangely commingled with tones appealing for help.

This time the sound indicated the direction, and the listener's resolution was at once taken.

Thrusting aside the undergrowth, and trampling under foot the tall grass, he struck into a narrow path, running parallel to the shore, and which led in the direction whence the cry appeared to have come.

Though it was now quite dark, he seemed easily to avoid impediments, which even in broad daylight would have been difficult to pass.

The darkness appeared no barrier to his speed, and neither the overhanging branches nor the wild-vine roots stayed his progress.

About a hundred paces further on, the path widened into a list that led to an opening, sloping gradually down to the beach.

On reaching its edge, he paused once more to listen for a renewal of the sound.

Nothing save the familiar noises of the night greeted his ear.

After a short pause he kept on for the water's edge, with head well forward, and eyes strained to penetrate the gloom.

At that moment the moon shot out from behind a heavy bank of clouds, and with a brilliant beam disclosed to his eager gaze a tableau of terrible interest.

Down by the water's edge lay the body of an Indian youth, motionless, and to all appearance dead; while stooping over it was another youth, also an Indian. He appeared to be examining the body.

For some seconds there was no change in his attitude. Then all at once he raised himself erect, and with a tomahawk that flashed in the moonlight above his head, appeared in the act of dealing a blow.

The hatchet descended; but not upon the body that lay prostrate.

A sharp report ringing on the air, for an instant silenced all other sounds. The would-be assassin sprung up, almost simultaneously, and two corpses instead of one lay along the earth.

So thought he who had fired the shot, and who was the young man already described. He stayed not to speculate, but rushed forward to the spot where the two Indians lay. He had recognized them both. The one upon the ground when he arrived upon the scene was Nelatee, the son of Oluski, a distinguished Seminole chief. The other was Red Wolf, a well-grown boy, belonging to the same tribe.

Only glancing at the would-be assassin to see that he was dead, he bent over the body of Nelatee, placed his hand upon the region of his heart, at the same time anxiously scanning his features.

Suddenly he uttered an exclamation of surprise. Beneath his fingers a weak pulsation gave signs of life. Nelatee might yet be saved.

Pulling off his hat, he ran down to the beach, filled it with water, and returning sprinkled the forehead of the young Indian.

Then taking a flask containing brandy from his pouch, he poured a portion of its contents down the throat of the unconscious youth.

These kindly offices he repeated several times, and was finally rewarded for his pains. The blood slowly mantled Nelatee's cheek; a shivering ran through his frame, and with a deep sigh he gazed dreamily upon his preserver, at the same time faintly murmuring, "Warren?"

"Yes, Warren! Speak, Nelatee; what is the meaning of this?"

The Indian had only the strength to mutter the words "Red Wolf"—at the same time raising his hand to his side with apparent difficulty.

The gesture made his meaning clear; Warren's gaze rested upon a deep wound from which the blood was still welling.

By the tremulous movement of his lips, Warren saw that he was endeavoring to speak again; but no sound came from them; his eyes gradually became closed. He had once more fainted.

Warren instantly flung off his coat, tore one of the sleeves from his shirt and commenced stanching the blood.

After a time it ceased to flow; and then, tearing off the second sleeve, with his braces knotted together he bound up the wound.

The injured youth slowly recovered consciousness, and looking gratefully up into his face, pressed the hand of his deliverer.

"Nelatee owes Warren life. He will some day show his gratitude."

"Don't think of that now; tell me what has happened? I heard you cry and hastened to your assistance."

"Not Nelatee's cry," responded the Indian, with a faint flush of pride suffusing his face; "Nelatee is the son of a chief—he knows how to die without showing himself a woman. It was Red Wolf who cried out!"

"Red Wolf?"

"Yes; Red Wolf is a coward—a squaw."

"Twas he who cried out."

"He will never cry out again. Look there!" said Warren, pointing to the lifeless corpse that lay near.

Nelatee had not yet seen it. Unconscious of what had transpired, he believed that Red Wolf, supposing him dead, had gone away from the spot.

Warren explained. Still more gratefully did the Indian youth gaze upon the face of his preserver.

"You had an encounter with Red Wolf, I can see that. Of course it was he who gave you this wound?"

"Yes; but I had first defeated him. I had him on the ground in my power; I could have taken his life. It was then that, like a coward, he called for help."

"And after?"

"I pitied and let him rise. I expected him to leave me and go back to the village. He feared that I might speak of his defeat to our tribe, and for this he determined that my tongue should be forever silent. I was not thinking of it when he thrust me from behind. You know the rest."

"And why the quarrel?"

"He spoke wicked words of my sister, Sansuta."

"Sansuta!" exclaimed Warren, a strange smile overshadowing his features.

"Yes; and of you."

"The dog; then he doubly deserved death. And from me!" he added, in a tone not loud enough for Nelatee to hear. "What a lucky chance."

As he said this he spurned the body with his foot.

Then turning to the Indian, he asked:

"Do you think you could walk a little, Nelatee?"

The brandy had by this time produced an effect; its potent spirit supplied the loss of blood, and Nelatee felt his strength returning to him.

"I will try," said the wounded youth; "Nelatee's hour has not yet come. He must not die till he has paid his debt to Warren."

"Then lean on me. My canoe is close by; once in it you can rest at your ease."

Nelatee nodded consent.

Warren assisted him to rise, and half carrying, half supporting, conducted him to the canoe.

Carefully helping him aboard, he shoved the craft from the shore, and turned its prow in the direction of the white settlement.

The moon, that had become again obscured, once more burst through the black clouds, lighting up the fronds of the feathery palms that flung their shadows far over the pellucid wave.

The concert of the nocturnal forest, for a time stayed by the report of the rifle, burst out anew as the boat glided silently out of sight.

CHAPTER II.

THE SETTLEMENT.

THE site of the settlement to which the canoe was directed merits description.

It was upon the northern shore of Tampa bay.

The soil that had been cleared was rich in crops of cotton, indigo, sugar, with oranges and the ordinary staples of food. The raising of stock also formed a part of the labor of the settlers.

Around were forests of useful timber, containing among other trees the well-known live-oak.

From the summit of a beautiful hill, upon the northwestern side, a magnificent panorama revealed itself.

The adjoining land sloped down to the waters of the bay, vying with each other in gorgeous hues and marvelous effects of light and shade.

The inland side embraced a district rich and varied. Everglades, savannas, forests and swamps, lay within a range of view comprised within a tract seemingly not more than fifty miles in extent, but in reality much greater. In that translucent atmosphere all objects appeared nearer than they actually were.

As the gazer's eye wandered over the landscape, it fell upon every charm of scenery that could be presented by nature. Huge trees here festooned with gossamer roses, there with sweet-flowering parasites, towered beside smiling savannas with verdant sward stretching away to the distant horizon.

Through the cultivated lands, mapped out like a painter's palette, ran a crystal stream, from which the rice-fields were watered by intersecting rivulets, looking like silver threads in a tissue.

Orange groves margined its course, running sinuously through the settlement.

In places it was lost to sight, only to reappear with some new feature of beauty. Here and there it exhibited cascades and slight waterfalls, that danced in the sunlight, sending up showers of prismatic spray.

There were islets upon which grew reeds, sedges and canes, surmounted by groups of caricas and laurel-magnolias, the exogenous tree overtopped by the tall, feathery palm.

In its waters wild fowl disported themselves, scattering showers of luminous spray as they flapped their wings in delight.

Birds of rare plumage darted hither and thither along its banks, enlivening the groves with their jocund notes.

Far beyond the swamp forest formed a dark, dreary background, which, by contrast, enhanced the cheerfulness of the scene. There, upon half-decayed cypress trunks, standing clear against the sky, perched in lonely grandeur the wood-pelican, looking like some bird-demon exulting over the surrounding ruin. Cranes, watchful and silent, stood like sentinels guarding the entrance to many a lone lagoon.

Looking seaward, the prospect was no less resplendent of beauty. The water, dashing and fretting against the rocky keys, glanced back in mist and foam. Snow-white gulls hovered along the horizon, their wings cutting sharply against an azure sky; while along the silvery beach, tall, blue herons, brown cranes, and scarlet flamingoes, stood in rows, their forms reflected in the pellucid element.

Such were the surroundings of the settlement on Tampa bay.

The village itself nestled beneath the hill already mentioned, and comprised a church, some half dozen stores, with a number of substantial dwellings, while a rude wharf and several schooners moored near by, gave token of intercourse with other places.

It was a morning in May—in Florida or elsewhere the sweetest month of the year. Borne upon the balmy atmosphere was the hum of bees and the melody of birds, mingled with the voices of young girls, and men engaged in the labor of their farms and fields.

The lowing of cattle could be heard in the distant grazing-grounds, while the tillers of the soil were seen at work upon their respective plantations.

There was one who looked upon this cheerful scene, without seeming to partake of its cheerfulness.

Standing upon the top of the hill was a man of tall, gaunt figure, and face somewhat austere in its expression.

His features, strongly lined with a firm expression about the mouth, marked him for a man of no common mold. He appeared to be about sixty.

As his keen, gray eyes wandered over the fields below, there was a cold, determined light in them, which betrayed no pleasant train of thought.

It spoke of covetous ambition.

Behind him upon the hill-top, of table-shape, were poles standing up out of the earth. Around them the sward was trampled, and the scorched grass, worn in many directions into paths, signified that at no distant period the place had been inhabited.

The sign could not be mistaken; it was the site of an Indian encampment.

Elias Rody, as he turned from gazing on the panoramic view beneath, cast a glance of strange significance at these vestiges of the red-man's habitation. His features assumed a sharper cast, while a cloud came over his face.

"But for them," he muttered, "my wishes would be accomplished, my desires fulfilled."

What were his wishes—what his desires?

Ask the covetous man such a question, and if he answered truly, his answer would tell a tale of selfish aspirations. He would envy youth its brightness, old age its wisdom, virtue its content, love its joys, ay, even Heaven itself its rewards, and yet, in the narrow bigotry of egotism, think he only claimed his own.

Elias Rody was a covetous man; and such were the thoughts at that moment in his mind.

They were too bitter for silence, and vented themselves in words which the winds alone listened to.

"Why should these red-skins possess what I so deeply long for? and only for their short temporary enjoyment! I would be fair with them; but they wrap themselves up in their selfish obstinacy, and scorn my offers."

How selfish others appear to selfish men.

"Why should they continue to restrain me? If gold is worth anything, surely it should repay them for what can be only a mere fancy! I shall try Oluski once again, and if he refuse—"

Here the speaker paused. He did not like, even to himself, to fashion into words what he would do in the event of a refusal. There are some thoughts exceedingly unpleasant to give expression to. Rody's were among them.

For some time he stood in contemplation, his eye roving over the distant view. As it again lighted upon the settlement, a smile, not a pleasant one, curled his lip.

"Well, there is time yet," said he, as if concluding an argument with himself. "I will once more try the golden bribe. I will use caution; but here will I build my house, come what may."

This natural conclusion to an egotistic mind appeared satisfactory. It seemed to soothe him; for he strode down the hill with a springy, elastic step, more like that of a young man, than one over whose head had passed sixty eventful years.

CHAPTER III.

ELIAS RODY.

WHILE Elias Rody is pondering upon his scheme, let us tell the reader who he is.

A Georgian, who began life without any fixed idea. His father, a wealthy merchant of Savannah, had brought him up to nothing; and, until he had attained man's estate, he faithfully carried out his father's teachings.

Like many Southern lads, born to competence, he could not appreciate the dignity of labor; and accordingly loitered through his youthful life, wasting both time and patrimony before discovering that idleness is a curse.

At his father's death, which happened upon Elias reaching his twentieth year, all the worthy merchant's property descended to his son, and the idler suddenly found himself the possessor of a large sum of money with a sort of feeling that something was to be done with it.

He accordingly spent it.

Spent it recklessly, freely and rapidly; and then discovered that what he had done was not the thing he should have done.

He then became reformed.

Which meant that, from a liberal, open-handed careless fellow, he changed to a cynical, cautious man.

In this case the usual order of change was reversed. The butterfly had become a chrysalis.

With a small remnant of his fortune and an inheritance from a distant relative, Elias became a man of the world, or rather a worldly man.

In other words, he began life for a second time, and on an equally wrong basis.

Before his eyes were two classes of his equals; reckless men with large hearts, and careful men with no hearts at all, for such was the organization of the society surrounding him.

Of the first class he had full experience—of the second he had none whatever.

To the latter he resolved to attach himself.

It is useless wondering why this should have been. Perhaps he had never been fitted for the community of large-hearted men, and had only mixed with them through novelty or ignorance of his own station.

Be this as it may, one thing is certain; he became, before long, a most exemplary member of the society he had selected for imitation. No one drove a closer bargain, saw an advantage, (to himself,) or could lay surer plans for securing it, than Elias Rody.

He learned, also, to control, and in every way wield influence around him. Power became his dream. He was ambitious of governing men.

Strange to say, this feeling was almost fatal to his prospects. We say strange, because ambition generally carves its own road and molds its own fortune.

Rody, however, had commenced an active career too late to arrive at much importance in the political world, that grand arena for attaining distinction.

He therefore cast about him for another field of ambitious strife, and speedily found it.

At this time, throughout the State of Georgia were many planters, who, without capital to purchase additional property, found themselves daily growing poorer, and their land became worn out with the exhausting crops.

These men were naturally enough the gamblers and discontented spirits of the community.

Another class were those with little save a restless disposition, ever ready for any venture that may arise.

Rody, shrewd and plausible, saw in these men the very instruments for a purpose he had long thought of, and had well matured.

"If I cannot attain the object of my wishes here," said he to himself, "perhaps I may be successful elsewhere, if I can only persuade others to believe in me. Here are men ready to my hand. I will take them with me; they shall be my followers, and while contributing their means to my end, they will look upon me as a benefactor."

Rody, it will be seen, was a thorough egotist. This idea becoming fixed in his mind, the rest was easy. He spoke to them of their present condition; drew a brilliant picture of what might be achieved in a new land; painted with masterly eloquence the increase of wealth and happiness his plan presented, and finally gathered around him a large number of families, with whom he started from Georgia, and settled in that section of Florida we have described.

The reason for Rody's selection of this spot was another proof of his profound selfishness.

In his reckless, generous days, he had, on the occasion of a visit to Columbus, been the means of saving from insult and outrage a Seminole chief, who had visited the capital upon some business connected with the State government. This act of generosity had been impulsive, but to the Indian it assumed the proportion of a life-long debt. In the fullness of his gratitude, the chief caused papers and titles to be drawn up in Rody's favor, giving a grant of a portion of his own property, lying on the shores of Tampa bay.

The Indian chief was named Oluski.

The grant of land was the settlement we have spoken of.

Rody at the time made light of Oluski's gratitude, and thrust the titles into his desk, without bestowing a second thought on the matter.

Now, in his days of worldly wisdom, these papers, with the Seminole's emblematic signature, were brought to light with very different appreciation. He saw that they represented value.

Elias Rody accordingly determined to make use of them. It ended in his carrying a colony southward, and settling upon Tampa bay.

The scheme which had originated in selfishness, turned out a success. The lands were valuable, the climate salubrious, and the colony thrived.

A bad man may sometimes do good without intending it.

Rody received even more credit and renown than he had expected; and, being a shrewd man, he achieved a part of his ambition. He was looked up to as the most important personage in the community.

Although some of the settlers did not approve of all his measures, still their opposition was rather negative than positive, and had as yet found vent only in remonstrances or grumbling. None had dared to question his prerogative, although he often rode a high horse, and uttered his diction in a tone too offensively arrogant.

What more, then, did Elias Rody want?

A covetous man always wants more. Oluski's gift was a noble one. It covered a large area of fertile land, with water privileges, and a harbor for trade. It was the choicest portion of his possession. The chief, in bestowing it, gave as a generous man gives to a friend. He gave the best he had.

Unfortunately the best he had did not embrace the hill, and therefore Rody was unsatisfied.

More than once during the progress of the settlement he cast a wistful eye upon the spot, as the choicest site in the whole district for a dwelling.

As his means had expanded, so had his tastes, and a grand dwelling became the desire of his life.

It must, perforce, be built upon the hill.

To every offer made to Oluski for a cession of this spot, the chief had firmly and steadfastly given a refusal. He, too, had his ambition, which, although not so selfish as the white man's, was not a whit less cherished.

For nine months in the year Oluski and his tribe dwelt in a distant Indian town, and only visited the waters of Tampa bay for the remaining three, and then only for purposes of pleasure. The wigwams of himself and people were but temporarily erected upon the hill. For all this, they had an attachment for the spot—in short, they loved it.

This was what Elias Rody stigmatized as a mere fancy.

There was another reason, held in similar estimation by Elias. In the rear of their annual encampment was an Indian cemetery.

The bones of Oluski's ancestors reposed therein. Was it strange the spot should be dear to him?

So dear was it in fact, that to every proposal made by Rody for the purchase of the hill, Oluski only shook his head and answered "No."

CHAPTER IV.

CRIS CARROL.

NELATEE recovered from his wounds.

Warren had conducted him to a hut, the temporary residence of a man of the name of Cris Carrol.

This individual was a thorough specimen of a backwoods hunter. He was rough in manner, but in disposition gentle as a child. He detested the formalities and restrictions of civilization. Even a new settlement had an oppressive air to him which he could not endure. It was only the necessity of disposing of his peltries and laying in a stock of ammunition that brought him into any spot where his fellow-creatures were to be found.

To Cris Carrol the somber forest, the lonely savanna, or the trackless swamp, were the congenial home, and bitterly he adjured the compulsory sojourn of a few days every year among those to whom society is a pleasure.

It was always a joyful day to him when he could shoulder his rifle, sling his game-bag over his shoulder, and start anew upon his lonely explorations.

When Warren brought the wounded Indian to Carrol's rude hut, the old backwoodsmen accepted the responsibility, and set himself to the task of healing his wounds with alacrity.

Nelatee was known to him; and he was always disposed to be a friend to the red-man.

"No; of course not," said he to Warren, in answer to his explanation; "I don't see as how you could take the red-skin up to the Governor's house. Old Dad wouldn't say no, but he'd look mighty like wishin' to. No, Warren, lad, you've done the right thing this time, and no mistake; and that there's sayin' more nor I would always say. Leave the boy to me. Bless you, he'll be all right in a day or two, thanks to a good constitution, along of living like a nat'ral being, and not like one of them city fellows as must try and make 'em-selves unhealthy by sleepin' in beds, and keepin' warm by sittin' aside of stoves, as if dried leaves and dried sticks warn't enough for 'em."

Carrol's skill as a physician was little short of marvelous. He compounded and prepared medicines according to unwritten prescriptions, and used the oddest materials. Not alone herbs and roots, but earthen and clays were laid under contribution.

A few days of this forest doctoring worked wonders in Nelatee; and before a week was over he was able to sit at the back door of the hunter's dwelling, basking himself in the sun.

Carrol, who had been in a fever of anxiety greater even than his patient, was in high glee at this. After giving the Indian youth a preparation to allay his thirst, he was on the point of picking up his traps to start upon one of his expeditions, when he saw an individual approaching his cabin from the front.

Thinking it was Warren Rody, he called out to him that Nelatee was "all right." He was somewhat surprised to perceive that instead of Warren it was his father who came forward.

"Good-morning, neighbor Carrol," said Elias.

"Mornin', Governor!"

"How is your Indian patient?" asked he whom Carrol called "governor;" "I hope he has entirely recovered."

"Oh, he's ready now, for the matter of that, to stan' another tussle, an' take another thrust. It wasn't much of a wound arter all."

"Ah, indeed," said Elias; "I heard from my son Warren that it was a bad one."

"Perhaps your son ain't used to sich sights. There's a deal in that. Would you like to see the Injin? He's outside at the back."

"No, thank you, Carrol. I didn't come to see him, but you. Are you busy?"

"Well, not so busy but I kin talk a spell to you, Governor, if you wishes it. I war only packin' up a few things ready for a start to-morrow."

Saying this, Carrol handed the Governor a stool, the furniture of the hut not boasting of a chair.

"And so you're off to-morrow, are you?"

"Yes; I can't stand this here idle life any longer than I'm obleeged. Tain't my sort. Give me the woods and the savanners."

At the very thought of returning to them the backwoodsman smacked his lips.

"When did you see Oluski last?" abruptly asked Elias.

"Let me see. It war across the Black Cypress swamp, near his own town—a matter of fifty mile from hyar as the crow flies. It war a fortnight ago, Governor, near as my memory sarves me; jest arter I'd shot the fattest buck killed this season. Oluski's people war all in a state o' excitement at the time."

"Indeed; about what?"

"Wal, Oluski's brother, who war chief o' another tribe, died not long afore, and his son Wacora had succeeded to the chiefship. Oluski was mighty perlit to his nephew, who war on a visit to Oluski's town when I war thar. I expect they'll all be hyar soon. It's about thar time o' comin' to Tampa."

"Did you see this Wacora, as you call him?" "I did so, Governor," answered Carrol; "and a likely Injin he is. Tall and straight as one o' his own arrows, and as proud as a turkey-gobbler. Thinks hisself a deal better nor any white man, no doubt."

While speaking, the hunter had taken down his rifle with the intention of cleaning it.

Elias sat for some moments silent, during which time Cris busied himself over his gun.

After a time he put the question:

"Is that all you had to say, Governor, or is it only for a bit o' gossip you came here?"

The "Governor," as Carrol styled him, started at this abrupt interrogatory.

After a short pause he answered it.

"No, Carrol, that is not all. What I had to say to you is this—you are a friend to the red-men, are you not?"

"Yes sir—eef so long as they behave themselves I am," promptly replied Cris.

"And they have a high estimation of you, have they not?"

"Wal—yes. I don't think there's much doubt about that, not speaking vain-like. I try to do the right thing by them critturs. I may say I do; I'm sartin on it."

"I also am their friend," said Rody.

"Wal, I ain't so sartin o' that," thought Cris to himself.

"And being their friend, I want to deal fairly by them. They have, however, a foolish sort of pride, that makes it difficult, especially in some matters. You see what I mean?"

"Yes; I see," responded the hunter, in a careless drawl.

"Well; in a bit of business I have with Oluski, I thought a friend might manage with him better than I could myself."

The Governor paused to give Carrol an opportunity of replying.

The backwoodsman, however, did not avail himself of it, but seemed immensely concerned about the condition of his rifle.

"So you see, Carrol," continued Ellis, "I thought that you might act the part of that friend in the negotiation I allude to. You see that, don't you?"

"No; I don't quite see that," said Cris, looking up with an odd smile upon his face, and a twinkle in his eyes. "But come, Governor! don't beat about the bush. Tell me what you want done, and I'll tell you right out whether I kin do it—yes or no."

"Well, then, Carrol, I will."

The Governor drew his stool nearer to Cris, as if about to impart some confidential secret, and in the friendliest manner.

The backwoodsman preserved a wary look, as if suspicious of an attempt to corrupt him. He was not alarmed. Cris knew himself to be incorruptible.

CHAPTER V.

PLAIN TALK.

"WELL, Mr. Carrol," proceeded the Governor, after a pause, "you know that our settlement has prospered, and as you may imagine, I have made money along with the rest."

"Yes, I know that," was the curt answer.

"And having now got a little ahead of the world, I feel that I have a right to indulge some of my fancies. I want a better house, for instance."

"Do you now?" said Cris.

"Yes. My dwelling-house is getting out of repair, and it wouldn't cost much more to build a new one than to patch up the old one."

"Wouldn't it, indeed?"

Carrol was very reticent. The Governor was compelled to get along without any aid from him.

"And so I've made up my mind to build, but I want a good site. Now you see what I'm driving at?"

"Well, no; I can't say that I do exactly."

"Why, Cris; you are dull to day! I say I want a good site for my new house."

"Well, ain't you got hundreds of acres, enough and to spare for the most tremendous big house as was ever built?"

"That is true, but on all my land there's not a spot I really like. Does that seem strange to you?"

"Mighty strange to me, but perhaps not so strange to you, Governor."

"But there is a bit of ground, Cris," continued Elias, "that I like exceedingly. The worst of it is, it's not mine."

"Why don't you buy it?"

"Just what I wish to do, but the owner won't sell."

"Perhaps you don't offer enough."

"No, that's not the reason."

"What is it then?"

"Do you know the top of the hill?" abruptly asked Rody.

"What! where the Injins make thar camp?"

"Yes; that's the place where I want to build.

Oluski won't sell that piece of property to me. Why, I don't know."

The Governor didn't stick closely to the truth while talking on a matter of business.

"Wal, what have I to do with that?" asked the backwoodsman.

"Why, I thought, if you were to see Oluski, perhaps you might talk him into letting me have the ground. I've set my mind on it, and I wouldn't care if it cost me a good round sum. I'll pay you well for any trouble you may take in helping me."

Elias Rody had but one estimation of his fellow-man, and that was that every one has his price.

In the present instance he was mistaken.

"It won't do, Governor; it won't do!" said Carrol, shaking his head. "I see now, plain as can be, what you're after, but I won't help you in it. If you want the property, and Oluski won't let you have it, then the Injin's got his own reasons, and it ain't for me to try and change 'em. Besides," added he, "I don't like the job, so no offense meant, but I must say no, and I says it once and for all. Is that all you've got to say to me?"

The Governor bit his lips with vexation; but possessing a wonderful command over his temper, he merely inquired what his son had said about Nelatee.

"Well, sir, he didn't say much about anything special, except to ask me to look after the Injin lad and see to his wounds. I did that in first-class style, and as I told you afore, he's all right. Your son has been down every day to see my patient, as the doctor chaps calls them they physicks. He 'peared mighty anxious to know how it was that he had come over to this part of the country alone, and where the young girl, his sister, was."

"Ah! so he was inquiring about her, was he?" exclaimed Rody, rising and pacing the hut with restless steps. He was glad of a pretext for his rage.

The backwoodsman uttered a prolonged whistle.

Suddenly pausing in his impatient strides, the Governor again faced him.

"So he was anxious about her, was he?"

Elias Rody was evidently out of temper, and was not afraid to show it; but Carrol was not exactly the person to care much about this.

"He was," was his cool answer; "but I don't know how I've got anything to do with it, except to tell him, and you, too, for the matter of that, that the red-man has his rights and his feelings. Yes, and they're both worth considerin' as much as if they war pale-faces like ourselves."

"And why to me, sir?" asked the Governor.

"Well, just because I ain't afraid to say to your face what I'd say behind your back, that is that your son had better stop thinking about that girl Sansuta as soon as may be, and that you'd best see to it afore worse happens."

A very outspoken man was the backwoodsman, and Elias Rody was sorry for having visited him.

Before he could recover from his surprise, Carrol resumed speech:

"There ain't no good, Governor, in mincing matters. Last year, when Oluski war here, your son war always prowlin' 'bout the Injin encampment, and down in the grove whar thar girls used to be. He war always a-talkin' to the chief's darter, and making her presents. I know what I see'd, and it wa'n't jest the thing."

"Perfectly natural, man," said the Governor, mastering his chagrin, and speaking calmly; "perfectly natural all that, seeing that Nelatee, Sansuta and my son grew up as children together."

"All that may be, but it ain't no use applyin' it now they're 'most growed up to be man and woman—and you knows it, Governor, as well as I do. As for Nelatee, he don't amount to shucks, and I sometimes wonder whether he is Oluski's son after all."

The home-truth in the first part of Carrol's speech pleased the Governor as little as any of his previous remarks, and, surprised at the freedom of the backwoodsman's language, he was silent.

Not so Cris, who had evidently determined to say more. His garrulity was unusual; and, once started, he was too honest to hold his peace.

"Governor, there's many things I've had in me to say to you at a convenient time. That time's come, I reckon, and I may as well clur it off my mind. I don't belong to your colony. I'm only a 'casional visitor; but I sees and hears thing as others don't seem to dare to tell you. Though why, I can't fancy, for you're only a man arter all, although you air the head man o' the settlement. As near as I can fix it in my mind, all y'ur people hev settled hyar on land that once belonged to the Injins. This being the case, it seems to me that the same laws as is made for the white man is made for the red-skins too. Now, Governor, it ain't so; or if they are made, they ain't carried out, and whar there's an advantage to be got for the white man at the expense of the Injin, why, you see, the law's strained just a leetle to give it. It's only a leetle now, but by-and-by it'll be a good deal. I know you'll say that's only natural, too, because that's the way you think; but I tell you, Mr. Rody"—here Carrol became excited—"that it ain't natural nohow, and it ain't right, and therefore mischief's bound to come o' it. Now I tell you, because you've more brains and more money than any o' the rest, of course you've got more to answer for. So, them's my sentiments, and you're welcome to them whether you like 'em or no."

"Well, Mister Carrol," replied Rody, with a withering emphasis on the "mister," "I'm glad you've given me your opinion; it's a valuable one, no doubt."

"I don't know whether it's a valyable one, but I know it's a honest one," answered Cris, with a quiet dignity, that despite his rough dress bespoke him a gentleman. "I have no object in giving advice to you, Governor. I only feel it a duty, and I likes to discharge my duties. The same way I thinks about your son Warren running after this Injin girl. No good 'll come o' that, neyther."

Whatever reply the "Governor" would have made to this last observation was cut short by the entrance of Warren Rody himself.

Seen now in the light of open day, the young man presented a strange contrast to his father. Of small stature, effeminate countenance, restless, shifting eyes, and a vacillating expression of mouth, he did not look like the son of the hard, rugged man who stood beside him.

He was neatly, almost foppishly dressed, and had a self-sufficient air not altogether pleasant. He seemed like one who would rather pass through the world with oily smoothness than assert himself with confidence of power and honesty of purpose.

As in the night he glided through the dark woods, avoiding every obstacle, so he now entered the backwoodsman's hut.

By one of those strange mental impressions impossible to account for, both Cris and the "Governor" felt that Warren had been a listener.

If so, he did not betray any sign of it, nor yet of annoyance at what he may have heard, but stood smilingly, tapping his boot with a handsome riding-whip.

"Ah, father, you here? Have you come to see the invalid, or to say 'good-by' to the hunter here, who tells me he is off to the wilderness to-morrow?"

His father did not answer him, but turning to Carrol, said:

"The matter I intended to have spoken to you about will do at another time, but I'm still much obliged to you for your good advice."

This was spoken with as much cutting politeness as could be well pressed into the speech.

As he turned to leave, he said aside to his son:

"Be home early, Warren. I have something particular to say to you."

Warren nodded, as his father passed out of the house, not at all pleased with the interview between himself and the backwoodsman.

Nothing disconcerts scheming men more than blunt honesty.

As soon as the Governor was gone, Carrol commenced humming a song. His new visitor waited for several moments before speaking to him.

"How is Nelatee?" he at length asked. "Will he be strong enough to travel to-morrow?"

"Not quite," said Carrol, pausing in the chorus part of his ditty; "he'd best remain here till his people come. They won't be long now, and the stay 'll give him time to get right smart."

"What was it that vexed my father, Cris?"

"Well, I don't know, 'cept he's tuk somethin' that's disagreed with him. He do seem riled considerable."

"But, Cris, are you really off to-morrow?"

"By sun-up!" answered Carrol.

"Which way are you going?"

Cris looked slyly at his questioner before answering.

"I don't know for sure whether it 'll be along the bay or acrost the big swamp. The deer air gettin' scarce near the settlement, and I hev to go further to find 'em. That's all along of civilization, darn it!"

"If you go by the swamp, you might do me a service," said Warren.

"Might I?" Then after a thoughtful pause, the backwoodsman continued: "Well, you see, Warren, it won't be by the swamp. I've made my mind up now, and I'm goin' along the bay."

Warren said "All right—no matter."

Then, with a word of explanation, parted from Cris and proceeded to find Nelatee.

As soon as he was out of sight, Carrol's behavior would have furnished a comic artist a capital subject for a sketch. He chuckled, winked his eyes, wagged his head, rubbed his hands, and seemed to shake all over with suppressed merriment.

"A pair of the artfullest cusses I ever comed across. Darn my pictur' if the young 'un ain't most too good. 'Was I goin' by the swamp? 'Cos then I might do him a service? No, no, Mister Warren, this coon ain't to be made a cat's-paw of by you, nor your father neyther. I ain't a-goin' to mix myself up in either of your serapes; leastways not if I knows it. Nor Nelatee sha'n't, if I can help it. I don't let him stir till his fellow-Injins come, and maybe that'll keep him out o' trouble. Not that he's much, but he ain't a bad sort o' a young red-skin—a reg'lar child of Nature, that's what he is. No, Mister Warren, you must do your own dirty work, and so must your father. Cris Carrol sha'n't help either o' you in that. If the young 'un don't mind what he's heard, although he made believe he didn't, and his father don't mind what I told him, there'll be worse come of it, or may I never more draw bead on buck."

CHAPTER VI. CROOKLEG.

WHEN young Rody took his departure from Carrol's hut, he went off in no very enviable mood.

His interview with Nelatee, although of the briefest, had been as unproductive of results as with the blunt old backwoodsman.

It is not a pleasant thing to find contempt for your own abilities impressing itself upon your mind. Nothing can atone for a bad opinion of one's own powers, when those powers are directed toward an unworthy purpose.

Without an analysis of this feeling, Warren Rody was still conscious of failure, and to him failure had hitherto seemed impossible.

So much of the parent's qualities at any rate, did the son possess.

He was to the full as selfish as his father, but lacked that experience which makes the concealment of egotism easy. In this his father was his superior.

The plain speaking indulged in by Carrol, and which he had overheard before entering the cabin, had annoyed him, while the oracular manner adopted by Cris had in no way assuaged the feeling.

The fact of the matter is, that the old hunter had made a close guess at the truth.

Warren had a passion for Sansuta, the daughter of Oluski.

Not a manly, loving passion, but a covert gambler's lust for possession without labor.

Her beauty had cast a spell upon him. Had his soul been pure, the spell would have worked its own cure. Out of the magic of her very simplicity would have arisen chaste love. But his head was wicked, and its growth weeds.

Hitherto the difference of race had shielded from harm the object of his admiration. He would have been ashamed to avow it in an honest way.

Secretly, therefore, he had forged a false friendship for her brother, as a mask to conceal his base treachery.

In the incident with which our tale opens, he had found a ready means of advancing his own interests, by more closely cementing Nelatee's simple friendship, and molding it to his will.

We have said that Red Wolf, the would-be assassin, fell by the bullet of his rifle.

With his hand upon the trigger, and in the very act of sending this wretch to his long account, a thought had flashed across young Rody's mind, which made his aim more certain.

Let us explain.

Nelatee said that Red Wolf had spoken wicked words of Sansuta and of Warren. The very conjunction of their names supplies the calumny.

Nelatee spoke truly, but what he did not know was, that the wretch who paid the forfeit of his life for his foul speech was but the dupe of Nelatee's own friend, Warren Rody.

Red Wolf, an idle, drunken scamp, had been a fit instrument in Rody's hands to be employed as a messenger between him and the Indian girl.

For these services Red Wolf received repeated compensation in gold.

But the old story of the bad master becoming discontented with a bad servant was true in this case.

Warren was afraid that Red Wolf would, in one of his drunken orgies, talk too much, and betray the secret with which he had intrusted him.

So far he was right; for it was while endeavoring to warn Nelatee of his sister's danger, that Red Wolf made use of improper language about the girl.

He had cast reflections upon Nelatee's sister while traducing his friend.

The issue is already known.

Wicked were Warren's thoughts as he stood, rifle in hand, watching the two.

If Red Wolf (and he recognized him at once) were removed in the very act of killing Nelatee a dangerous tongue would be forever silenced; while Nelatee's friendship would be further secured, and Sansuta eventually become his prey.

The decision was taken—the bullet sent through Red Wolf's brain, and Warren Rody accomplished a part of his own prophecy.

Having succeeded so far, it was terribly mortifying to find that one clear-sighted individual had penetrated his schemes, and had, without appearing to do so, placed a restraint upon the otherwise warm sense of gratitude with which Nelatee regarded him.

All this Cris Carrol had done, and therefore Warren Rody was angry with him.

He left the cabin vowing vengeance on Carrol, and casting about for the means to accomplish it.

He had not long to wait, or far to seek.

At the end of the by-road upon which the backwoodsman's dwelling stood, he encountered the very tool suitable for his purpose. It was in the person of a negro, with a skin black as Erebus, who was seen perched upon the top of a tall fence.

He was odd enough looking to attract attention.

His head, denuded of the old ragged piece of felt he called hat, was unusually large, and covered with an enormous shock of tightly curled wool. This did not, however, conceal the apish form of the skull that bore a strong resemblance to that of a chimpanzee.

Rolling and sparkling in a field of white were eyes preternaturally large and wickedly expressive, above a nose and mouth of the strongest African type.

His arms were ludicrously long, and seemed by their unusual proportions to make up for the shortness and impish form of the body.

He was whistling in a discordant strain, some wild melody, and kicking his heels about like one possessed.

As Warren Rody approached, he paused in this ear-splitting music, and leaped nimbly from his perch, while flourishing his tattered felt in a sort of salutation.

It might have been observed that he was lame and the few halting steps he took imparted a droll bobbling motion to his diminutive body.

His dress was a curious warp of rags, woven, as it were, upon a still more ragged wool.

They were held together more by sympathy than cohesion.

In his right hand was a stout, gnarled stick, with which he assisted himself in his frog-like progress.

At sight of young Rody the huge mouth of this uncouth creature seemed to open from ear to ear, while a double row of teeth filled the hiatus like a gleam of baleful light.

"Hal hal! Whoo! whoo! Gor bress me if it aren't Massa Warren hisself dat I sees! My stars, massa, but dis ole man am glad to see ye, dat he is!"

Such was his salutation.

The young man came to a stop and surveyed the negro with a smile.

"Well, Crookleg, what do you want with me you old fiend?"

"Hal hal! ho! ho! bress him, w'at a brave young gen'l'm it is! how han'som'—jess like a pictur! 'What do the ole fien' want? Why, ne want a good deal, massa! a good deal!"

"Are you out of work again?"

"Hal hal! ain't done a bressed stroke of work, massa, for more nor two week, ain't, 'pon dis old nigga's solemn word. Ain't had it, massa, to do. Poor Crookleg am most used up. Ya, most used up."

As if to prove his last assertion, the hideous wretch cut a high caper into the air, and settled down again in a grotesque attitude.

Young Rody laughed heartily at this feat, slapped his riding-whip roughly across the negro's back, pitched a piece of silver to him, and passed on.

While Crookleg stooped to pick up the coin he glanced after him under his arm, and saw with some surprise that the youth had paused at a few paces distance, as if in thought.

After a time the latter faced round, and came back along the road.

"By the way, Crookleg," said he, "come up to the house; my sister may have something to give you."

"Ha! ha! he! he! Miss Alice, bress her, so she may, massa. I'll come, sart'in. Dis ole nigga's always glad to get what he can from Miss Alice."

"And," continued Rody, "ask for me when you come. I may find something for you to do that'll help you along a little."

Not staying to hear the voluble expressions of gratitude with which Crookleg overwhelmed him, Warren strode on, and was soon lost to sight.

The moment of his disappearance the darky perpetrated another aerial leap, and then hobbled off in a direction opposite to that pursued by the Governor's son.

He could be heard muttering as he went:

"Wants to see dis chile, does he? Why, dat looks good for de ole nigga; and who knows but what de long time am a-coming to an end, and all dis ole nigga's work is a-gwine to be done for him by odder folk? He! he! dat would make dis chile bu'st a-laffin'—he! he! he!"

CHAPTER VII.

THE TWO CHIEFS.

OUR story now takes us fifty miles inland from Tampa bay.

The spot, on the edge of an everglade.

The hour, noon.

The dramatis personæ, two Indians.

One an old man, the other in the prime of life.

The first, white-headed, wrinkled, and with traces of a life spent in action.

He presented an appearance at once striking and picturesque, as he stood beneath the shade of a tall palm tree.

His dress was half-Indian, half-hunter. A buckskin shirt, leggings and moccasins richly worked with beads. A wampum belt crossed his shoulder. A scarlet blanket hung at his back, its folds displaying a figure which in its youth must have been superb. It still showed, in the broad chest and powerful limbs, almost its pristine strength.

Upon his head he wore a band of bead-work, in which were stuck three wing-feathers of the war eagle.

His face was full of dignity and calm repose.

It was Oluski, the Seminole chief.

His companion was no less remarkable.

As he lay stretched upon the ground, leaning on one elbow, his face upturned toward that of the old man, a striking contrast was presented.

Like Oluski, his dress was also half-Indian, half-hunter, but more richly ornamented with bead-work, while a certain careful disposition of the attire seemed not inappropriate to his youth and bearing.

It was, however, in his features that the difference was chiefly apparent.

In the attitude he had assumed, a ray of sunshine, piercing a break between the trees, illumined his countenance. Instead of the coppery color of the Indian, his skin was of a rich olive, an unmistakable sign that white blood flowed in his veins.

He was remarkably handsome. His features were regular, well defined and admirably chiseled. His eyes were large and lustrous, over-arched by a forehead that denoted the possession of intellect.

Like the old man, he wore a plume of eagle's feathers on his head, as also a wampum belt; but, in lieu of a blanket, a robe made of skins of the spotted lynx, was thrown over his shoulders.

Oluski was the first to speak.

"Must Wacora depart to-day?" he asked.

"At sunset I must leave you, uncle," replied the youth, who was his nephew, already spoken of as Wacora.

"And when do you return?"

"Not till you come back from Tampa bay. I have still much to do. My father's death has placed me in a position of trust, and I must not neglect its duties."

"I and my tribe depart from this place in seven days."

"And Nelatee; where is he?" asked Wacora.

"I expected him ere this. He and Red Wolf went away together."

Oluski was ignorant of what had happened.

"They went upon a hunting excursion, and if not able to return in time, were to go on to the bay, and there await our coming."

"You still make your summer encampment upon the hill? I have not seen it since I was a boy. It is a shame, too, since our people are buried there."

"Yes, and therefore it is dear to you as to me."

"And yet the whites have a settlement near it. It was your gift to them, uncle. I remember that."

Wacora spoke with an accent that sounded almost sneering.

The old chief answered warmly:

"Well! I owed their chief a debt of gratitude. I paid it. He is my friend."

"Friend?" said Wacora, with a bitter smile. "Since when has the pale-face been a friend to the red-man?"

"Still unjust, Wacora? I thought you had changed. The foolish sentiments of youth should give place to the wisdom of age."

Oluski's eye brightened as he spoke. His heart swelled with noble feelings.

"I do not, will not, trust in the white man!" answered the young chief. "What has he done to our race that we should believe in him? Look at his acts, and then trust him if you can. Where are the Mohawks, the Shawnees, the Delawares and the Narragansets? How has the white man kept faith with them?"

"All white men are not alike," responded Oluski; "a pale-face befriended me when I required aid. The deed always weighs against the word. I could not be ungrateful."

"Well! Oluski's gratitude has been proved," returned Wacora. "But let him beware of those on whom it has been bestowed."

The old chief did not answer, but stood in an attitude of thought.

Ideas, slumbering till now, were awakened by Wacora's words. An unknown feeling appeared to gain possession of him.

So contagious is mistrust.

His nephew, too, seemed lost in thought. Still lying upon the ground, he idly plucked the petals of a flower growing by his side.

The conversation was at length resumed by his uncle.

"I have nothing to charge the white chief with; or his people. Our tribe yearly visits the place—we are welcomed on arrival, respected during our stay, and unmolested at leaving. No, Wacora! these white men are not like others."

"Uncle, all white men are the same. They make their homes in our land. When space is needed, the Indian must yield to them. What faith or friendship can exist where there is no equality? Do not the Seminoles suffer, at this very moment, from the white man's ambition? Are not their hunting-grounds profaned by his presence—their towns pillaged for his fancied wrongs? Your friend is a white man, and therefore the enemy of your race."

Wacora spoke passionately.

Old age, or perhaps habit, had blunted Oluski's sense of the encroachments described by Wacora.

History unfortunately sustains the younger chief's assertion. Over the entire American continent, there has been, along with the advancement of civilization, a cruel disregard of the rights and feelings of the Indians. Treaties have been wantonly broken or misconstrued; and persecution on one side has led to bitter retaliation from the other. It is sad to think that this history is not yet complete.

The whites have, it is true, in every instance prevailed. The tribes who still hold their own do so more by the tacit consent of the conqueror, than through any concession of justice.

The moment there appears a necessity for removing the Indians from their lands, the pretext is not wanting.

It is easily found, and then the course of events is invariably the same.

First some petty tyrannies, some fancied grievances, or slights, gradually increasing in importance by the mere excited feelings of the two races—then open aggressions leading to bloodshed, ending in wild warfare, massacre, and annihilation.

These generally fostered, or as often caused, by selfish speculators or land-agents.

The Indian is not always a savage. The reverse is often the case. In every tribe, there are men of education, of quick intelligence, and with a high sense of right.

Think of their leaders in the wars of Creek and Cherokee, Shawnee and Delaware. Think of Tecumseh. Remember Logan!

The Seminoles were ever remarkable for intelligence, and among them were men of liberal education. Schools had been established—the peaceful pursuits of agriculture and trade encouraged, and the ground-work for moral elevation and citizenship securely laid.

These facts may appear strange; but, they are none the less true.

Both Oluski and Wacora were superior men, in the sense that education and natural intelligence give the stamp of superiority over ignorance and superstition.

CHAPTER VIII.

SANSUTA.

As we have said, Wacora had white blood in his veins.

His mother was a Spaniard.

In one of those afflicting contests, the result of unjust legislation by the Spanish Government, Wacora's father, at the head of his tribe, waged war against the whites, and in the last conflict in which he took part, made captive of a Spanish girl, the daughter of a planter, who lived near the town of San Augustine.

Several years elapsed before a peace was concluded between the contending parties, and in the interim, the maiden, who was almost a child at the time of her capture, seemed to have entirely forgotten her own kindred; and either through affection or taste, became devoted to the chief, who had been her captor.

It ended in her becoming his wife, and the mother of Wacora.

Several such instances may be remembered in the history of the early settlements.

Albeit that in Wacora's veins white blood flowed, his soul was Indian, and he loved his father's people, as if he had been of their purest blood. High aspirations for their future greatness filled his thoughts. He dreamed of a golden future, when the Indians should hold a high position among men, upon the land of their forefathers.

His soul was noble—his heart pure.

He was a patriot of the most enthusiastic stamp.

His judgment, clear in most things, was clouded in estimating the qualities of the white race, simply because he had seen the worst phase of their character, its cupidity and selfishness.

If this disadvantage, inseparable from the first approach of so-called civilization, affected him, how much more must it have affected the ignorant men of his nation!

We leave to casuists the answer.

Oluski would have replied to his companion's address, but the same train of disagreeable thought that had entered his mind at the first part of Wacora's speech, held him silent.

Wacora proceeded:

"Enough, uncle; I did not intend to trouble you with my feelings—I meant only to warn you against danger—for danger exists in all dealings with the pale-faces. They, as ourselves, are true to their instincts, and those instincts blind them to justice. Your friend, the white chief, may be all you think him. If so, he will rather admire your caution than blame you for mistrust, natural, because not causeless."

Whatever reply Oluski intended was postponed by the arrival of a third person, at whose coming Wacora sprung from the ground with a gesture of surprise and admiration.

The new-comer was an Indian maiden.

With light, elastic step she approached the spot.

As she stepped across the broad belt of sunlight between the trees, she seemed a natural part of the silvan scene—a perfect wood-nymph!

She was a girl of slight stature, beautifully-rounded limbs, with hands and feet unusually small.

Her dress was simplicity itself, yet so gracefully worn that it seemed the result of labored art. A tunic of bright-colored cloth, clasped round her neck by a silver brooch, descended to her ankles, while round her waist was twisted a scarf of many colors. Over her shoulders fell a bright cloth mantle, bordered with shells worked into delicate patterns. Upon her head was a bead-work cap, trimmed with the plumes of the white egret like a fringe of newly-fallen snow. Her wrists were circled by bead bracelets, while embroidered moccasins covered her small feet.

She smilingly approached Oluski, and nestled close to the old chief, who, spite of years and infirmity, stood erect beside her.

Wacora seemed puzzled by the fair one's presence.

"I had forgotten," said Oluski, "that you are strangers to each other; Sansuta, your cousin Wacora stands before you."

Sansuta, for she it was, smiled upon the young Indian.

He did not approach the spot where father and daughter stood. His impassioned eloquence had vanished. He could scarce find words for the simplest salutation.

Oluski, perceiving his bashfulness, hastened to his relief.

"Sansuta has been upon a visit, and has only now returned. It is many years since you have seen her, Wacora; you did not expect her to have grown so tall?"

Wacora finished the sentence.

"Nor so beautiful!" he said.

Sansuta cast down her eyes.

"No praise like that should reach an Indian maiden's ear," said Oluski, with a pleased smile nevertheless; "Sansuta is as the Great Spirit has made her—that is sufficient."

The girl did not seem to share her father's sentiments; a slight pouting of her beautiful lips implied that the compliment was by no means unpleasant.

Wacora was again dumb, as if half-regretting what he had said.

Such is the power that beauty exercises over bravery.

The young Indian warrior actually blushed at his boldness.

"But what brings you here, Sansuta?" asked her father. "Did you not know that your cousin and myself were in council?"

The pretty Sansuta had recovered her composure. The pout had disappeared from her lips, which, opening to answer her father's question, revealed two rows of teeth of a dazzling whiteness.

"I am here to bid you both to the evening meal," she said.

Her voice, melodious and soft, struck upon Wacora's ear like the music of the mock-bird.

The charm was complete.

Forgetful of his late conversation, forgetful for a time of his thoughts and aspirations, oblivious of his own enthusiasm, he stood, a very child, eagerly watching her, and listening for those tones again.

It was Oluski, however, who spoke:

"Come, Wacora: let us go with her."

The old chief strode away from the spot, Sansuta by his side.

Wacora followed, with a new feeling in his heart.

It was love!

CHAPTER IX.

THE INDIAN VILLAGE.

A WEEK later, the table-top of the hill overlooking the settlement, presented a changed picture. It was one of active life.

The naked poles, formerly standing there, had disappeared, and comfortable Indian dwellings—wigwams—were in their place.

At the doors of several were planted lances and spears, with plumes and pennons depending from them.

These were the residences of the chiefs.

In the center of the group was a large building, which was carefully, almost elaborately constructed, and which far overtopped the others.

It was the council house of the tribe.

Around the doors of their respective dwellings, the owners might be seen engaged in every variety of employment, or peaceful idleness. Children frolicked in the presence of their parents, and dusky maidens, in twos and threes, loitered up and down the main street or avenue.

At one of the doors, an interesting group seemed rapt in attention at the recital of a story that was being told by an aged chief.

The chief was Oluski; and, among the individuals around, was his daughter, Sansuta.

The others were his kindred. They had assembled, as was their usual evening custom, in front of his wigwam, to listen to tales of virtue or valor, of deeds done by their ancestors in the days of the early Spanish settlers.

The Indians are admirable listeners; and, in the easy, natural attitudes into which they fell as they leant forward to catch Oluski's words, they formed a charming tableau.

The venerable chief, with dignified action, measured speech, and great skill in modulating his voice, held their attention, as much by the manner as the matter of his narrative.

As the incident he was relating developed pathos, chivalry, horror, or revenge, so did his audience yield themselves to its influences. By turns they lowered their eyes, shuddered, stared wildly around, with knit brows and clinched hands.

Like all people constantly communing with nature, they were easily moved to joy or sorrow, and not civilized enough to make any attempt at concealing it.

As Oluski sat in their midst, the observed of all observers, he looked the picture of a patriarch.

The time and place were both in harmony with the subject.

Oluski's story drew to a close. His hero had achieved his triumph, the distressed Seminole maiden was rescued, and joy and union wound up the tale which had for more than an hour held his listeners enthralled.

"So, now, children, away! The sun is sinking in the west, the hour of council is at hand, and I must leave you. Return to-morrow, and I will relate to you some other episode in the history of our tribe."

The young people rose at the chief's bidding; and, with "thanks" and "good-nights," prepared to depart, Sansuta among the rest.

"Where are you going, child?" asked her father.

"Only to the spring, father; I shall be back soon."

As the girl said this she turned her face away, as if wishing to avoid her father's gaze. The other people had all departed.

"Well," said the old man, after a pause; "do not forget to return soon. I would not have you abroad after nightfall."

She murmured a few words, and sauntered away from the spot.

Oluski did not immediately depart, but stood leaning against the spear that stood up in front of his dwelling. The old man's eyes were filled with tears, while a hand was laid upon his heart.

"Poor girl," he reflected, as he watched her form disappearing in the fast-darkening twilight "she never knew her mother. I sometimes think I have been but a poor guardian of Sansuta's steps. But the Great Spirit knows I have tried to do my duty."

Sighing heavily, he brushed the tears from his eyes, and strode off to the council-house.

CHAPTER X.

AN APPOINTMENT KEPT BY DEPUTY.

LET us follow the footsteps of Sansuta.

Once out of sight, and conscious that she had eluded her father's observation, she quickened her steps, not in the direction of the spring, but toward a thick clump of live-oak, which grew at the foot of the hill.

As she approached the spot, her pace gradually became slower, until she at length came to a stop.

As she paused, a shiver ran through her frame.

She was evidently in doubt of what she was doing.

The sun had sunk below the horizon, and darkness was rapidly falling over the landscape.

A distant murmuring alone gave token of the proximity of the Indian village upon the hill.

After a few moments, and while Sansuta still stood beside the grove, these sounds ceased, and perfect silence reigned around the spot.

Presently a cuckoo's note was heard, followed by another nearer and louder, that was in its turn succeeded by three others.

While the echo of the last still vibrated on the evening air, the maiden was startled by a sudden apparition.

It sprang into view at her very feet, as if the ground had opened suddenly, to give it passage.

When the girl regained courage sufficient to look upon it, her fears were in no way lessened.

Standing in a grotesque attitude she beheld a negro, with arms enveloped in a ragged garment, moving about like the sails of a wind-mill, while a low chuckle proceeded from his huge mouth.

"He! ho! ho! Brest if de ole nigra didn't skear de galumpious Injin. He! he! he! Gorry, if de Injin beauty ain't turn white at de show ob dis chile!"

It was Crookleg who spoke.

He seemed to enjoy the scare he had given the maiden; for after having ceased to speak, his gurgling cackination was continued.

It was some time before Sansuta recovered presence of mind sufficient to speak to the black deformity before her.

"What do you want?" was all she could gasp.

"Ha! ha! ha! It warn't dis ugly ole nigga what the big chief's chile 'spected to meet, war it? No. I know it warn't. But don't be skeared; ole Crookleg won't hurt ye. He's as innocent as a angel. He! he! he!—as a angel!"

Here another caper similar to the one with which he had introduced himself, placed him in a still more impish attitude.

The Indian girl had by this time recovered from her first surprise, seeing that some attributes of humanity appertained to her strange interlocutor.

"Again, what do you want? Let me pass. I must return to the village."

"Gorry, an' it arn't Crookleg dat will hinder you," the negro answered, standing directly in her path. "He only want to say a word to you, dat is if you are de beautiful Sansuta, de darter ob de chief?"

"I am the chief's daughter. That is my name. I am Sansuta!"

"Den de young gen'l'm'n tole dis ole darky true w'en he say I find you down by de live-oak grove at sunset—he tole one ole nigga true."

A blush overspread the young girl's face as Crookleg spoke. She did not answer him.

"He say to me," continued the negro, "dat I war to tell de 'lady,' (there he chuckled) 'dat he, de gen'l'm'n, couldn't come to meet her to-night, on accoun' o' de ole man, his bossy, w'at hab gub him somethin' tickler to do. He send ole Crookleg tell her dat, an' gib her somet'in' what I's got hyar in my pocket—he! he! he!'"

Saying these words, the monster made a series of movements, having in view the discovery of his pocket.

After a most elaborate and vigorous search for its aperture among the multitudinous rags, he succeeded in finding it. Then plunging his long right arm therein, up to the elbow, he drew forth a small parcel wrapped in white paper, and tied with a string of dazzling beads.

With another acrobatic bound he handed it to the trembling girl.

"Dere it am, safe an' soun'. Dis ole nigga nebber lose nuffin' and offen find a good deal. Dat, says de gen'l'm'n he speak of, is for the most lubly of her seck, de Missy Sansuta."

The tender look accompanying this speech was something hideous to behold.

Sansuta hesitated before taking the parcel from him, as if in doubt whether she should not decline it.

"Da! take it!" urged he; "It ain't nuffin' as 'll go off an' burt ye; dis nigga kin sw'ar to dat."

Not so much this friendly assurance, as a resolution the girl had come to, decided her. She stretched forth her hand, and took the package. This done, she essayed once more to move past the negro, in order to return to the hill.

Crookleg, however, still blocking up the path, made no movement to give way to her.

He had evidently something more to say.

"Looker hyar," he continued; "I war bid to tell de lubly Injin lady, that the gen'l'm'n w'u'd be at dis berry spot, to-morrow mornin' early to meet her, and I was 'tickler told say dat it was private, and not to be told no 'quisitive folks w'at might want to know. Now I think"—here Crookleg took off his tattered hat, and scratched his wool—"dat's all dis nigger war tole to say—yes! dat's all!"

Without waiting for a reply, the monstrosity made a pirouette, then a bound, and disappeared so suddenly, that he was gone before Sansuta could recover from her surprise.

Once assured that she was alone, the maiden hastened to untie the string around the packet, and lay bare its contents.

Her gratified glance fell upon a pair of showy ear-rings, and affixed to them a small slip of paper.

Though but an Indian maiden, the chief's daughter had learned to read.

By the last glimpse of departing twilight, she read what was written on the paper. There were but two words:

"From Warren."

CHAPTER XI.

THE COUNCIL.

OLUSKI'S entrance into the council-house was the signal for all eyes to turn toward him.

Slowly, and with dignity, he traversed the space between the door and the seat reserved for him at the upper end of the hall.

Once there, he turned around, bowed gravely to the assembled warriors, and then took his seat.

Pipes were now lighted, and gourds filled with honey and water handed around.

Oluski declined the latter, but lighted one of the pipes, and for some time watched, as if in reverie, the circling of the smoke.

The silence that ensued upon the old chief's entrance continued for several minutes; at length a young warrior, opposite to him, rose and spoke:

"Will our chief tell his brothers why they are called together, and what it is that makes him thoughtful and silent? We will hear and advise—let Oluski speak!"

After this brief address, the young man resumed his seat, while those around the circle murmured their assent to what he had said.

Thus solicited, Oluski arose, and spoke as follows:

"It is not unknown to many of our warriors now present, that I was deputed by their elder brothers and themselves, many years since, to go to the pale-faces, in Georgia, to settle some old disputes about lands sold by our people to them, and about which, wicked men, of both races, had caused quarrels and bloodshed. I departed on my errand, went to the great town where their council-house stands, spoke truth, and made new treaties with them. All this I did, and our people were pleased!"

A chorus of voices ratified the chief's statement.

"It may be remembered that I made new friends with some of the pale-faces and concluded treaties founded on justice, which gave to our people property they needed in exchange for lands which we did not require."

Renewed signals of assent.

"To one pale-face more than to others, I was under bonds of gratitude. He did me great service when I required it, and I promised to repay him. An Indian chief never breaks his word. I gave to that man some of the lands left to me by my fathers. These are the lands upon which the white settlement now stands. The pale-face I speak of was Elias Rody!"

The voices of the assembled warriors were silent; an eager expectancy of look was all the answer Oluski received at mention of Rody's name.

The old chief continued:

"To-day, Elias Rody came here and talked with me. He told me the hour had arrived when I could do him a great service, and again prove myself grateful for the aid he had afforded me. I told him to speak out. He did so. I listened. He said the colony he had founded was prosperous, but there was one thing he still desired, and this was the favor he came to ask. Twice before he had spoken of it. This time he required a final answer. His demand was more than I could of myself grant. I told him so. For this reason have I called you into council. I will lay his wish before you. It is for you to decide."

Oluski paused to give opportunity for any one who chose to make a remark.

None was made; but the listeners looked around them as if trying to read each other's thoughts.

The chief proceeded:

"What the white man wants is to buy from us this hill upon which our habitations are built."

A chorus of angry dissentient voices greeted the proposal.

"Hear me out," continued Oluski, "and then decide."

Silence ensued as sudden as the noisy interruption.

"The white chief offered me one hundred rifles, two hundred square Mackinaw blankets, five kegs of gunpowder, fifteen bales of cloth, and one hundred shot-belts, besides beads, knives and small articles. For this he desires to have possession of the hill, as far as the borders of the settlement, and the strip of land lying along the shore of the bay. I have told you this with no remark of my own to influence your decision. To you, brothers, I leave it. Whatever it may be, Oluski will abide by it."

Saying this, he sat down.

The young warrior who had already spoken, once more rose to his feet and addressed himself to the chief.

"Why does Oluski ask us to decide? The land is his—not ours."

Without rising, the chief replied to the question. His voice was sad and subdued, as though he were speaking under compulsion.

"I have asked you, my sons," said he, "for good reason. Although the land is my own, the graveyard of our ancestors, which adjoins the property, belongs not only to the whole tribe, but to the children of the tribe forever."

A silence, such as precedes a storm, fell upon the assembly.

Then every voice within the council-chamber was simultaneously raised in loud protestation, and had Elias Rody seen the flashing eyes and angry gestures, or heard the fierce invective hurled back to his proposal, he would have hesitated to repeat it.

Amid the wild turmoil, Oluski sat with head bowed upon his breast, a feeling of sorrow in his heart.

The angry debate that succeeded did not last long. It was but the ebullition of a common sentiment to which the expression by one voice was alone wanting.

It found it in the same youthful warrior who had spoken before. The wishes of the warriors being known, he, as well as any other, could give them voice.

"The chosen of the tribe have decided," said he, amid perfect silence. "I will proclaim their answer."

"Do so," Oluski said, simply raising his head.

"They despise the white chief's bribe, offered for the bones of our ancestors. They bid me ask Oluski what answer he intends making to the pale-face."

The old chief rose hastily to his feet—his form and eye dilated.

Glancing proudly around the assembly, he cried out, in a clear, ringing voice:

"Oluski's answer is written here!"—as he said this he struck his spread palm upon his breast. "When the white chief would have it, it shall be NO!"

A cry of approbation from every warrior present greeted this patriotic speech. Hastening forward, they pressed around the chief with ejaculations of joy.

The aged patriarch felt his blood freshly warmed within his veins—he was young again!

In a few moments the excitement subsided, and the warriors, retiring from the council-house, moved off toward their respective dwellings.

Oluski was the last to emerge from the council-chamber.

As he stepped across the threshold, the fire that had animated him seemed to have become suddenly extinguished, his form was bent, his steps tottering and listless.

As he looked down the hill, he caught a glimpse of the white man's settlement, with its window-lights twinkling through the darkness.

One, more brilliant than the rest, attracted his attention.

It was the house of Elias Rody.

"I fear," said the old chief, in a dreamy voice, "my gift will prove fatal alike to him and me. When ambition enters the heart, honor and justice find no home therein. Our people cannot know that man in the past—they must judge him by his present. I would be generous—the Great Spirit knows that—but I must also be just. If I have raised angry feelings at this council, I have nothing to charge myself with. I but did my duty. May the white chief's heart be turned from the covetous thoughts which fill it. Great Spirit, hear my prayer."

With a natural and beautiful action, the aged Indian raised his hands in supplication to that Power alike cognizant of the thoughts of white and red!

CHAPTER XII.

THE SITUATION.

SINCE the meeting in the council-house several days had elapsed.

The answer of the Seminole warriors had been conveyed to the white Governor by Oluski himself.

The old chief couched the decision in kindly words, mingled with regrets.

Elias Rody was wonderfully self-possessed.

He smiled, shrugged his shoulders, grasped the Seminole's hand, and with a wave of his own seemed to dismiss the subject from his thoughts.

Nay, more; he presented the old warrior with a beautifully-inlaid rifle, a bale of broadcloth, and a keg of powder.

"Come, come!" said he speaking in the friendliest tone, "don't let a mere whim of mine affect such a friendship as ours. You must accept these things—mere trifles. Your taking them will prove that you harbor no unkindness toward me or mine."

Thus pressed, Oluski accepted the presents.

The Governor smiled covertly as the old chief departed.

Nelatee had recovered from his wound. He daily spent hours in company with Warren, and there was no lack of diversion for the white youth with his red-skinned companion.

Their canoe darted through the blue waters of the bay, or stole dreamily along the river's current.

Their rifles brought down the wild-fowl upon the sea, or the quail and partridge upon the land.

Their fishing-rods and spears furnished many a dainty dish.

Sometimes, going further afield, they would bring home a deer or a brace or two of wild turkeys; or, bent on destruction, would penetrate some dark lagoon, and slay the hideous alligator.

The pretexts of these pursuits presented were constantly improved by Warren.

He molded his conduct and expressions to suit the simple faith and understanding of his Indian companion.

He concealed beneath a considerate kindness the dark thoughts that were brooding in his bosom, and was the very semblance of what he professed to be—a friend.

Nelatee, generous and confiding, was flattered, and charmed by his condescension. With the simple faith of a child, he trusted his white associate.

"Ah, Nelatee," would the latter say, "if I had only the power to do what I wish, I would prove myself a true friend to the Indians. Our race are afraid to show any real sympathy with them, on account of old and stupid prejudices. Wait until I am in a position to prove my words, and you will see what I will do. Why, even now, I'd rather sit near you fishing, or tramp with you across the country on a hunting excursion, than spend the time among my own people, who cannot understand either me or my ways."

What wonder that Nelatee, after such sentiments, should insist upon baiting his white companion's hooks, paddling his canoe, carrying his loaded game-bags, or relieving his shoulder of the weight of his rifle?

From a friend he became almost a servitor.

So debasing is flattery—so artful is selfishness?

Young Rody played his game, in pursuit of Nelatee's sister, with the same deep treachery as had secured the young warrior's friendship.

In a thousand designing ways he impressed himself on Nelatee's mind as a chivalrous, self-sacrificing fellow, worthy the love of any maiden. Then, adroitly singing soft praises of Sansuta to the brother's pleased ear, he insured in him a faithful ally and warm panegyrist.

Sansuta, pleased with an admiration which she never paused to question, blushed at her brother's report of Warren's good qualities. With that mysterious power of divination possessed by a young girl's heart, she took them as an expression of the passion felt for herself, and saw through the violent friendship between the young men only another proof of her own powers of fascination.

Not that she was unconscious of it through more direct means.

More than one interview had been brought about between her and Warren Rody through the medium of the negro monster—no longer so in her eyes.

Many articles of adornment had come into her hands, and were kept hidden from her father's sight. She dared not wear them, but in secret gloated over their possession, as over the feeling which had prompted the gift.

Sansuta, it will be seen, was a coquette; though one through vanity, not vice.

She was innocent as a child, but inordinately vain.

She had grown up without a mother's care, had been so much thrown upon her own resources that all her faults were those of untrained nature.

Her heart was warm, her affection for her father and brother deep and true; but she was too prone to assimilate with the bright side of life, and to tremble at anything with the appearance of dullness.

Differently placed, this Indian maiden might have become a heroine. As it was she was nothing but a frivolous child.

With a generous man, her defenseless position would have insured her safety.

Not thus with Warren Rody.

Her innocence seemed but to provoke him to accomplish her ruin.

It would be trouble saved—triumph secured.

A great triumph truly. The conquest, through her own simple love, of a harmless child!

The son did not belie his father's nature.

Crookleg had become useful to him in his scheme. This hideous creature proved far more subservient and trustworthy than the defunct Red Wolf, for he was all obsequious obedience.

True, he sometimes glanced askance with an ugly look bent upon his young master; but the look vanished in a hideous grin whenever the latter turned toward him.

What dark mystery lay hidden in the negro's mind, no one white knew; but all, by a common impulse, gave way to him as he passed. Children ran shrieking, and hid their faces in their mothers' aprons; the boys paused suddenly in their play as he hobbled by, while the old gossips of both sexes shook their heads and thought of "the devil" as he approached them.

He seemed only fluttered by these signs of detestation, and chuckled with glee at the aversion he inspired.

The Indians, meanwhile, pursued their usual avocations.

The waters of Tampa bay were dotted with their canoes. Troops of their children frolicked on the plateau, or plucked the wild flowers that grew along the sloping sides of the hill. The women of the tribe followed their domestic avocations, and the whole scene around the wigwams was one of tranquil contentment.

The white settlers were not idle either. The fields were smiling with crops which the planters had commenced to gather in. A goodly store of merchandise was collected upon the wharf, and several schooners had come to an anchor in the bay.

Peace and plenty abounded in the settlement.

But, as before the storm a small, dark cloud specks the bright sky, gathering as it grows, so was there a cloud too small for human ken, drifting up over this peaceful scene which should carry death and destruction in its wake. Slowly but surely was it coming.

CHAPTER XIII.

A SUBTERRANEAN SNARE.

A MORNING in the forest.

What beauty! what delight!

The wild flowers gemmed with dew, the quivering foliage vying in color with the emerald sward, the vistas dreamily gray and endless, the air balmy, the light soft and grateful.

What a melody the birds make, a very paradise of sound!

What flashes of splendid blues, reds and yellows, as they dart from branch to branch.

What a succession of novelties and charms for eye and ear!

Thoughts like these filled the mind of an individual seen near the settlement on a lovely morning, a few days after the council held by Oluski with his warriors.

The individual in question was a woman. She was on horseback, and as she checked her steed to gaze upon the scene before her, she presented to view a face and form signally beautiful.

A frank, fearless young face, with all of true maiden modesty. Her hair, in a rich, golden shower of curls, fell over a forehead of snowy whiteness, and a neck and shoulders admirably rounded.

Her figure was graceful and striking, its contour shown off by the dark riding-dress she wore.

A hat, with a heron's plume, stuck saucily on one side, covered her head.

The horse she rode was a Seminole steed—of the Andalusian race—small, but well-proportioned; and, as evidenced by the arching of its neck, proud of its fair burden.

She remained for some time, silently feasting her senses with the lovely prospect, herself a charming addition to its interest.

After a while she gave the rein to her horse, and allowed it with a dainty, mincing step to pick its way along the path, occasionally making a pretense of alarm, pricking up its ears, drawing its head on one side, and doubly arching its pretty neck as some idle butterfly or quick-winged humming-bird darted across the road, or rose suddenly from a bed of wild flowers.

For a considerable distance the young lady proceeded without adventure or mischance, while her horse, having apparently exhausted all its little affected airs, stepped along with an even, rapid step.

The fair equestrian's thoughts had not, it seemed, undergone any change, for the same pleasant smile illumined her countenance.

The way was clear before her, the morning bright and beautiful, and all nature seemed filled with light and harmony.

Her thoughts were gay and happy, and in unison with the surroundings.

In this mood was she proceeding on her journey.

Suddenly—indeed so suddenly as to cause her alarm—her steed came to a stop, showing signs of being scared.

His eyeballs were distended, his fore-feet planted stiffly in advance, his mane standing almost straight, while he trembled in every limb.

Another step, and horse and rider would have disappeared beneath the surface of the earth, and forever.

They were on the brink of one of those subterranean wells or "sinks," common in that part of the country, whose danger us concavity is concealed by a light crust of earth; and only by the sudden sinking of the support beneath him, is the unwary traveler apprised of the peril.

Over the covering of the abyss the grass grew as greenly, the flowers bloomed as brightly, as elsewhere.

And yet, under that fair seeming was a trap that conducted to death.

In an instant the fair rider comprehended her peril.

To advance would be certain death; to attempt to back her steed upon its own tracks almost as certain destruction.

She knew but one thing to do—and she did it.

Gently patting the creature's neck, she addressed it in soothing words, while with a wary hand she held the bridle; her touch upon the horse's mouth so delicate that the very breeze might have swayed it.

Her hand did not tremble, nor her eye quail, although the ruddy tinge upon her cheek had altogether disappeared.

After a time the horse seemed to gain confidence; his tremor became subdued, and instead of the wild frenzy in his eye, there was a dull look, while a foam rose to his nostrils and sweat bathed his limbs.

She continued to caress his neck, and soothe him with soft words.

Moving neither up nor down, to right or to left, with her delicate hand she still held the bridle.

But the danger still threatened; she saw it as she cast her eyes below.

The ground was crumbling, slowly but surely, beneath the horse's feet, and a fissure had already opened wide enough to show a deep, black chasm underneath.

She shuddered, closed her eyes for a second, and then opened them only to see the fissure widening—the blackness growing more intense!

A prayer rose up from her lips. She waited for the catastrophe!

The tension on the horse's nerves became too great; again the animal trembled—its knees began to yield.

The ground seemed all at once to give from beneath its feet.

His rider felt that she was lost!

No!—saved!

Just as her closing eyes saw the courageous animal slide into the black chasm, and heard its last snort of terror, she felt herself lifted from the saddle, borne from the spot; and then—

She knew no more.

She had fainted!

CHAPTER XIV.

A TRUE GENTLEMAN.

It was Cris Carrol who had rescued the fair equestrian.

The old hunter had perceived her danger, and with the quickness of thought mastered the whole situation.

Without uttering a word he stealthily approached the spot, until reaching a tree, one of whose branches extended over the horse's head.

To climb it, spring out on the projecting limb, and lift the young lady out of the saddle, were acts performed almost instantaneously.

What followed was not so easy.

He had not counted on the feminine weakness of fainting, and with the dead weight of the swooning girl upon his arm, there was still a difficulty as to his future movements. How was he to get back along the limb?

He saw that nothing but sheer strength could accomplish it, and accordingly exerted all he had.

With one hand grasping the branch, and the other around the unconscious form, he made a superhuman effort, and succeeded in reaching the trunk of the tree. Against this he supported himself until he had recovered breath and strength.

While thus resting, he was witness to the ingulfing of the gallant steed, as the snorting animal sunk into the chasm below.

The old hunter heaved a sigh. He was sorry for the creature, and would have saved it had the thing been possible.

"Wal, darn it! if it ain't too bad for a good plucky critter like that to die sich a death! Cuss them 'tarnal sink-holes! They've been the misfortune of a many a one. Thank goodness I've saved the feminine!"

The "feminine's" condition now demanded his attention, as the temporary faintness was passing away, and she showed signs of returning animation.

With rare tact and delicacy, the old hunter, regardless of his own fatigue, softly lowered himself and his fair burden to the ground; then, gently withdrawing his arm from her waist, he drew back a step or two.

Taking off his seal-skin cap, he wiped the perspiration from his brow, and with the gallantry of a true gentleman, waited until she should address him.

The young lady he had rescued was no ordinary person.

The faintness which had come upon her, continued only for a short while. Recovering consciousness, she understood at a glance, not only the nature of the service rendered her, but also the character of the man who had rendered it.

"Oh, sir! I'm afraid, that you've run a fearful risk. I needn't tell you how grateful I am."

"Wal, miss, it war rayther a toughish struggle while it lasted. But bless ye, that's nothin' so long as it's turned out right. If you'd not been the plucky one you air, nothin' I could ha' done would have helped ye. It war your own grit as much as my muscle that saved ye from fallin' into that thar darn'd trap."

"My horse! Where is he?"

"Y'ur right, there; he's gone, poor critter. I'd ha' liked to saved him too, for the way he behaved. That dumb critter had more sense in him than many a human, and it u'd ha' done me a sight o' good to have pulled him through; but it warn't possible, nobow."

"Tell me, sir, where did you come from? I did not see you."

"Wal, I war clost by, an' see'd you ride right on to the danger. It war too late to holler, for that would only ha' made things worse, an' skeered you both. So I said nothin', but jest dropped my rifle, and made tracks toarst ye. I spied the branch above you, an' speeled up to it. The rest war nothin'—only a spell o' twistin' an' wrigglin'."

He did not tell her that the muscles of his arms were fearfully swollen, and that it demanded all his power of endurance to prevent him groaning at the intense agony he suffered.

But the young lady, with a quickness of apprehension, seemed to understand this too.

"Nothing, do you say? Oh, sir, it's another proof of your noble courage. I can never show you enough gratitude. For all that I feel deeply grateful."

Her voice trembled with emotion—tears welled into her eyes.

Her brave heart had well endured danger; but could not contemplate, without betraying its emotions, the self-generosity of her preserver.

"Wal," said he, in order to change the conversation, which he thought too flattering toward himself; "what do you intend doing, now that your horse is gone?"

She wiped the tears from her eyes, and in a firm voice answered him:

"I'm not more than four or five miles from my home. I merely rode out for pleasure. I little thought that my excursion would end thus. Where do you live, sir? I don't remember to have seen you before. Certainly you are not a resident of the settlement?"

He shook his head negatively.

"No, I ain't a resident of no place. I'm as you see me, a hunter. I have been at the settlement, though, many a time—in fact, on that thar spot afore thar war any settlement. It war enough for me to know they war a-comin', so I pulled up stakes, and quit. You see, miss, it don't do for a hunter to live among the clearin's; besides, I'm a deal happier by myself."

"No doubt, to a contented mind, such a life as yours must be a happy one."

"That's it, miss; to them as is contented. Do you know I've often and often puzzled over the expression o' that thar idea, and never could hit it; and yet you've gi'n it in the snappin' of a jack-knife."

"Perhaps you were going to the settlement when you saw me?"

"No; exactly t'other way. I war goin' from it. I've been down beyont hyar to meet a friend o' mine. It ain't long ago, though, since I war in the colony, and staid a spell there. Now I'm bound for the big savanna—that is, arter I've seen you home, and out of danger."

"Oh no, thank you; that's not at all necessary. I'm used to wandering about alone, although this part of the country is a little new to me."

"If you'll allow me, miss, I'll go with pleasure."

"That I cannot do. All I want to know now is your name?"

"Cris Carrol," was the hunter's reply.

"Then," said she, holding out her pretty, white hand, "Cris Carrol, I thank you with my whole heart for the service you have rendered me. I will remember it to my dying day."

Like a knight of ancient chivalry, the backwoodsman stooped, and kissed the proffered hand.

When he stood erect again, a flush of pleasurable pride made his rugged face look as handsome as an Apollo's. It was the beauty of honesty.

"Bless you, miss, bless you! Cris Carrol will allers be too glad to do a service for one that's raal grit as you are. That I'll sw'ar to. Bless you!"

As she turned to take her departure, a sudden idea struck the backwoodsman.

"Why, what a darn'd old fool I am. I never axed her for her name. You'll pardon me, miss," said he: "I'm sure you will, but—"

"But what?" she asked, smilingly.

"But might I ask your—I'd like to know—"

here he stammered and stuttered.

"You want to know my name, that's it, isn't it?"

"The very thing!"

"Alice Rody!"

The old backwoodsman started on hearing it.

CHAPTER XV.

BROTHER AND SISTER.

As Alice Rody left the spot which had so nearly proved her tomb, she thought of the old hunter with admiration. His courage and honest courtesy had won her; but she had also noticed his surprise on hearing her name.

Of the feeling entertained by him for her father and brother, she knew nothing.

The female mind loves riddles, and Alice, like a true woman, racked her brain for a solution of that one Carrol's conduct seemed to embody.

Thus occupied, she emerged from the forest, and had proceeded some distance upon her road when she perceived two individuals in close conversation.

Their backs were toward her, and as her light footfall did not disturb them, she got close to the spot on which they stood without their perceiving her.

Near enough, in fact, to hear the following:

"Hark you, you black rascal! If you betray me it will be the worse for you. I have a means of silencing those who prove false to me."

Whatever reply the "black rascal" would have made, was prevented by an impetuous gesture of the speaker, who had caught sight of Alice.

"Ah, Alice, you here?" said he facing toward her; "I did not know you were abroad."

It was her brother Warren.

Alice recognized in the "black rascal" no less a personage than Crookleg.

Warren thrust a piece of silver into the negro's hand.

"There, there! That'll do. I'll forgive you this time, but remember! Now be off with you—be off, I say!"

Crookleg, cut short in his attempt to address Alice, hobbled away, muttering some words to himself.

"Why, Warren!" asked his sister, "what makes you speak so harshly to poor Crookleg?"

"Because he's a pestilent fellow. I want him to know his place."

"But a kind word doesn't cost much."

"There, sister; no scolding, if you please. I'm not in the best of humors now. Where is your horse?"

Alice told her brother of the incident, and spoke warmly of Carrol.

"So the old hunter did you a good service, did he? I didn't think he had it in him, the old bear."

"How unjust you are, Warren. Bear, indeed! Let me tell you that Cris Carrol is as good a gentleman as ever lived!"

As she said this, she showed signs of indignation.

"Is he, indeed?" was the brother's mocking retort.

"Yes; a thorough gentleman! One who wouldn't wound another's feelings if he could help it, and that's my idea of a gentleman!"

"Well, we won't argue the point. He has done good this time, and that'll go to his credit; for all that, I don't like him!"

Alice bit her lip with vexation, but made no reply.

"He's too officious," continued Warren; "too free with his advice—and I hate advice."

"Most people do, especially when it is good," quietly answered his sister.

"Who said it was good?"

"I know it was, or you would have liked it and have followed it."

"You are sarcastic."

"No—truthful!"

"Well, as I am in no mood for quarreling, we'll drop the subject, and Cris Carrol too."

"You may, but I shall never drop him. He is my friend from this time forward."

"You are welcome to choose your friends. I'll select my own."

"You have done so already."

"What do you mean?"

"That Nelatee, the Indian, seems to be one of them."

"Have you anything against him?"

"Oh, no! I am only afraid he'll be the loser by the intimacy."

"Am I so dangerous?" asked her brother.

"Yes, Warren, you are dangerous; for with all your pretended goodness, you lack principle. You cannot conceal your real character from me. Remember I am your sister."

"I'm glad you remind me; otherwise I should forget it."

"That's because you avoid me so much. If you believed in my wishes for your welfare, you would not do that."

Her voice trembled as she spoke.

"Indeed; then I beg you won't waste your sympathies on me? I'm perfectly able to take care of myself."

"You think you are."

"Well, have it that way if it pleases you better; but what has this to do with my friendship for the Indian?"

"A great deal. I don't like your intimacy with him; not because he's an Indian, although that is one reason, but because you have some purpose to serve by it that'll do him no good."

"Why, one would think you were in love with the young copper-skin!"

"No; but they might think he is in love with me."

"What! has he dared?"

"No, he has dared nothing; only a woman's eye can see more than a man's. Nelatee has never spoken a familiar word to me, but for all that I can see he admires me."

"And you—do you admire him?"

The young girl stopped in her walk. Her eyes sparkled strangely as she answered:

"Shame, brother, to put such a question! I am a white woman; he is an Indian. How dare you speak of such a thing?"

Warren laughed lightly at his sister, as he answered:

"Why, you don't think that I care for the fellow, do you?"

The young girl saw her opportunity, and seized it.

"And yet you pretend to be his friend. Ah! have I caught you by your own confession?"

"Again, what do you mean?"

"That my doubts are now certainties—that some wicked scheme is concealed under this false friendship for Nelatee."

"You are mad, Alice!"

"No, perfectly sane. You have some design; and I advise you, whatever it be, to abandon it. You don't like my tears, so I'll try to suppress them if I can; but I implore you, Warren, brother, to give it up; now and forever!"

She dashed a few bitter drops from her eyes ere she spoke again.

"I have only you and my father to look to for support and comfort. My heart has yearned toward you both, but has met with nothing but coldness. Oh! Warren, be a brave man; brave enough to despise wickedness, and you will not only make me happy, but perhaps avert that terrible retribution which overtakes transgression. There is time yet. Hear my prayer, before it is too late."

Her pleading voice fell upon an ear that heard not. The appeal did not reach her brother's stony heart.

With a few commonplaces, he endeavored to exculpate himself from any evil intention toward the young Indian.

All in vain.

Her woman's instinct saw through his hypocrisy, and showed him to her as he was—wicked!

That night Alice Rody prayed long and earnestly for support in an affliction which she felt was but too surely coming. And she wept till her pillow was bedewed with tears.

CHAPTER XVI.

A CHANGED CHARACTER.

A WONDERFUL change had come over the conduct of Elias Rody.

He was most gracious, most condescending.

He kissed all the children, chatted with the mothers, and listened to their narratives of infant ailments, husbands' delinquencies, or household troubles.

To the surprise of many of the poorer settlers, the hitherto autocratic "Governor" took, or appeared to take, great interest in their affairs, and more wonderful still, in some instances put his hand into his pocket to relieve their pressing necessities.

Petty matters seemed to become deeply interesting to him, and he devoted time and attention to their adjustment.

Through all this his temper was conciliating and amiable. Many personal quarrels, among the settlers, were forgotten and forgiven through his means, while coolnesses were warmed into new friendships by his mediation.

This was the work of some time, and the astonishment at his unwonted amiability gave way to self-censure on the part of the observers, who charged themselves with having done him great injustice.

How had it happened that neighbor this or friend that could ever have dared to accuse him of meanness or falsehood? And as to his irritability of temper—well, that had gone now—while with regard to his arrogance—no one who knew Elias Rody could call him arrogant.

If he had a fault, it was certainly that of being too easy. Stingy? No; there must be some mistake about that; for no stingy man would have sent down provisions for the poor, have rebuilt widow Jones's barn, or bought Seth Cheshire a new horse; and what mean man would have lent money to that drunken, but popular Jake Stebbins, whose fiery nose, should Jake be abroad, was as a light-house on a dark night, to any belated traveler.

This was the impression that gradually got abroad about Elias Rody.

He only smiled, rubbed his hands softly together, and muttered, "Humph!"

The monosyllable was full of meaning.

It meant that he thought his labor well bestowed; and that the design he had in view was prospering even beyond his expectations.

What this design was must be already apparent. He had courted this popularity to enable him to accomplish the dearest wish of his heart.

After his bland dismissal of Oluski, laden with gifts, he had acquired a control over his own naturally impetuous temper which astonished himself.

The refusal of the Seminole chief to give him quiet possession of the hill was the more annoying because it seemed to close forever any further attempt at negotiation.

He understood the Indian character sufficiently to know that they were unchangeable in their opinions, and seldom, if ever, to be moved from a resolution once taken.

This tenacity of purpose had, time out of mind, brought ruin and devastation upon themselves as on those who sought to coerce them, and Rody ground his teeth in impotent rage when Oluski had announced the decision of the Indian council.

The Judas smile that succeeded had root in another thought, which the Governor had kept out of his mind until the supreme moment of his defeat.

Hence his changed conduct toward his fellow-settlers.

They became, almost to a man, believers in him, and ready to do his bidding.

He did not neglect, in his Machiavelian policy, to insinuate in every artful way his pet project of possessing the property on which the Indians were encamped. So artfully, indeed, that in most instances the idea seemed to have originated in his listeners' minds, and by them to have been suggested to Elias, thus skillfully reversing the true facts of the case.

This once accomplished, the rest was simple.

A general feeling got abroad that the red-men were interlopers, and had no right to usurp a spot so necessary and so useful to the colonists. This feeling, although not loudly expressed, was very deep, and in nearly every instance, sincere.

The few clear-headed and impartial planters who were proof against Rody's sophistical speeches, were assailed by him in a different manner; by specious promises of enlarged possessions, or by matter-of-fact appeals for the advancement of civilization. If he did not gain their approval, he at any rate made their objections seem narrow-minded and selfish.

Only a few sturdy, honest men, held out; these Elias could do nothing with. They rejected his proposals, laid bare his false arguments, and laughed at his facts; but, as they were a very small minority, they had little influence.

Ere Rody had accomplished this pacific revolution of opinion, the autumn had waned, and the winter months—if such a word can be used where there is no winter—approached, and with it the limit of the term of the Indians' stay upon the hill.

With the first appearance of cool weather, Oluski and his tribe repacked their household goods, took their dwellings to pieces, and with their wives, children, horses and cattle, quitted their late encampment.

The bare poles again appeared cutting against the clear sky.

The hill was once more uninhabited.

A new sort of activity had sprung into existence upon its table-top.

In the place of Indians, with their painted plumes and primitive finery, the ground was occupied by white men, carpenters and other artisans, along with their negro attendants.

Piles of prepared lumber, stones and other building materials strewed the ground, while the busy workmen, black and white, made the air resonant with their jocund voices.

A finished frame house soon made its appearance on the spot where the Indians had but recently dwelt; a large structure, substantially built, and ornamental in finish.

It belonged to Elias Rody!

He had secured the sanction of the settlers, and they had determined to support him in his piratical design. Only a very few of them had stood out against it.

Thus strengthened, he had resolved upon, and had now completed, his act of usurpation.

CHAPTER XVII.

OVER-CONFIDENCE

OLUSKI'S dwelling, in his place of permanent abode, was a more pretentious affair than the wigwam temporarily inhabited by him at Tampa bay.

The eastern residence of the tribe was an old Indian town that had been built long before the Spaniards had landed in Florida, and in it his people, for many generations, had dwelt.

The chief, having returned from an extended hunting-excursion, was pleased to find himself once more beneath his paternal roof.

Doubly pleased, for he had brought back with him his nephew, Wacora, who, thinking of his pretty cousin, had accepted his uncle's invitation with alacrity.

Behold them, then, with pipes lighted, seated inside the house, Sansuta in attendance.

Wacora watched the lithe-limbed maiden as she flitted to and fro, engaged in household duties. He thought her attractive as ever, a certain consciousness on her part of the fact in no way detracting from her beauty.

"I am pleased, nephew," said Oluski, "pleased to see you here again. I feel that I am no longer young; the support of your arm in a wearying day's march has been very welcome."

"It is always at your service, uncle."

"I am sure of it, if Oluski thought otherwise, he would be unhappy. Your cousin here, Sansuta, came to see you as much as to bear me company. You should thank him for it."

"I do."

"Wacora is thanked already in the smile of welcome that met him in Sansuta's eye."

The young girl blushed at the delicate compliment, and going out, left the two chiefs together.

"You tell me, Wacora, that the affairs of your tribe are prosperous, and that there is peace and harmony in your council-chamber?"

"Yes, uncle, the same as in my father's lifetime."

"That is well, for without that there is no real strength. So it is with us."

"You have told me nothing of the pale-faces on Tampa bay."

"They are our firm friends still. In spite of your fears, Wacora, Rody and the colonists are true to their promises."

"I am pleased to hear Oluski say so," was the nephew's reply.

"I did not tell you that the white chief had made an offer to buy the hill."

"To buy the hill! What hill?"

"That on which we make our annual encampment. We call it Tampa after the bay."

"Indeed! He wants that, too?" rejoined the young chief, in a tone savoring of indignation.

"Yes; I called our council together and told them of the offer."

"And their answer?"

"The same as my own; they refused."

Wacora gave a sigh of relief.

"When I carried that answer to the white chief, he was not angry, but met me like a friend."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. He pressed upon my acceptance rich presents, and told me that Oluski's friendship was worth more than land."

"But you refused the presents?" said the young Indian, eagerly.

"I could not; my old friend would take no denial. Fearing to offend him, I yielded."

"You should have refused them, uncle."

"You say that because you are suspicious. I have no doubt about those who are my friends."

"Yes, uncle, I am suspicious, and always will be of the white man. He gives nothing that he does not expect to have returned tenfold. To the red-man he gives glass, and demands back gold."

"That is true in many instances, but not in this. The white chief gave valuables, and only asked the Indian's friendship."

"That is what he said; what did he mean?"

"I see you will not be convinced. I do not blame you; but, I would have you think well before you condemn. A whole race are not answerable for the wrongs done by a few!"

"I will try to think so. If I am in error, I will confess it, and believe all the good of them you could wish."

"You talk like a true man, Wacora, and Oluski is gratified hearing it."

The conversation was interrupted by the entrance of an Indian, one of the warriors of the tribe.

"What does Marocota want?" asked Oluski.

"To speak to Wacora, the chief."

Wacora desired him to express his wishes in the presence of his uncle.

"Marocota must speak to Wacora alone, if Oluski will allow it."

Oluski made a sign to his nephew, who, rising, followed the man outside the door.

"Wacora must follow me further," signified the Indian.

"Go on, I will do so."

Marocota led the way, and only paused in his walk when they had got some distance from the dwelling.

"Has Wacora faith in Marocota?"

The young chief started at the question, which his guide had put to him in a tone of strange earnestness.

"Yes; I have faith in you."

"And he would serve Oluski, our chief?"

"With my life!"

"Sansuta is dear to Oluski!"

Again Wacora started. Marocota's words were enigmatical.

His guide continued.

"Sansuta is beautiful!"

"We all know that. Was it to tell me this you brought me here?"

"The pale-faces admire the beauty of our Indian maidens."

"What of that?"

"One pale-face has marked Sansuta's beauty!"

"Ha!"

"His eyes gladden at sight of her; her cheeks grow red at sight of him!"

"His name?"

"Warren Rody."

"How do you know all this?"

"Marocota is Oluski's friend, and watches over his chief's happiness. To-night Warren's messenger was in the town—the negro, Crookleg."

The young chief was silent. Marocota watched him without breaking in upon his thoughts.

Recovering himself, Wacora asked:

"Where did you see the negro?"

"In the old fort."

"The old fort? What was he doing there?"

"Marocota followed his trail, a lame foot and a stick, and saw him as he entered the ruin. Some one was waiting for him inside!"

"Who?"

"His master!"

"Warren Rody?"

Marocota nodded. "I heard their talk," he said.

"What did they say?" asked the young chief.

"At first I could not hear—they spoke in whispers. After a time they grew angry. Warren abused Crookleg, and struck him. The black man uttered a fierce oath, and leaped over the wall of the fort, at the side opposite to where I lay hid."

"Did you hear their conversation before they quarreled?"

"I heard the pale-face say, Crookleg had only half done his errand, and must return to complete it. The black refused. It was then that the other got angry and struck him."

"This is very strange, Marocota. It is some treachery I cannot understand. The negro must be found, and questioned!"

"Well, Massa Injin, dat ain't hard to do! He! he! he!"

Had the fiend of darkness himself risen between the two Indians, they could not have been more startled, than when these words were uttered in their ears; for it was Crookleg who spoke.

The darky appeared delighted at the effect his sudden appearance had created, since he continued for some time to chuckle in great glee.

"Yas; he be de 'dential nigga w'at you war a-wishin' for. You hab found him 'thout gwine far! He! he! he!"

Wacora turned sternly toward him.

"And having found you, wretch, I mean to keep you till I've made you speak the truth!"

"De trufe, Massa Injin, am w'at dis ole nigga always speak. He can't help it, 'kase it comes so nat'ral to him. Trufe an' innocence is dis chile's only riches, t'ank de Lord!"

The look which accompanied the impious assumption was almost diabolical.

Wacora cut him short in an attempt to continue his speech, by a command instantly to make known what Warren Rody wanted, with what message he had been charged, and to whom.

Crookleg, however, was not easily taken at a disadvantage.

"Well, Massa Injin, I don't mind tellin' you somet'ing, but I don't like talkin' afore other folks. You send dis individdle away"—pointing to Marocota—"and ole Crook 'll tell you all about it; he meant to do so when he comed here so sudden."

With a sign the chief dismissed Marocota, and telling the black to follow, led him a little distance further from the town.

A long and apparently interesting conversation ensued, in which Crookleg's gesticulations were as usual violent, while the young chief, with arms folded and brows knit, listened to his narrative.

It was late ere they separated, the negro hobbling back in the direction of the ruin, while Wacora returned to his uncle's dwelling.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A LOVE MEETING.

THE old fort, as already said, was in a ruinous condition.

It had, at one time, been a stronghold of the Spaniards, but on their quitting that part of the country, it had been suffered to fall into decay.

Early in the morning succeeding Wacora's interview with Crookleg, two persons stood conversing near the inner wall of the ruin.

They were Sansuta and Warren Rody.

The Indian girl had stolen from her father's house unnoticed by the few early risers, and with cautious steps had gained the fort.

Warren's presence at such a distance from Tampa bay, as well as Crookleg's attendance upon him, were thus explained.

"I am very grateful to you, Sansuta, for coming here to meet me."

"I am afraid I have done wrong."

"Wrong? What can you mean?"

"That I am deceiving my father, my kind father; but it is for the last time."

"The last time?"

"Yes; I have determined that this shall be our last meeting. I could not endure my father's reproach, if he knew I had betrayed his confidence."

"Do you doubt my love for you, Sansuta? Will it not make up for Oluski's anger?"

"Warren!"

The reproachful tone in which Sansuta uttered his name, recalled young Rody to himself. He changed his tactics.

"But why talk of Oluski's anger—rather speak of my love. Surely you do not doubt it?"

The Indian maiden heaved a sigh.

"Sansuta does not doubt you, but she is unhappy."

"Unhappy! Why?"

"Because an Indian girl would made but a poor wife to a white gentleman."

A strange smile crossed the young man's face. He did not, however, interrupt her.

"If Sansuta cared for you less, she would not have been here this morning; she would not have seen you again."

"Come, come! dearest, you alarm yourself without reason. Need I keep telling you how much I love you—how I have always loved you? Have we not grown up together? What more natural than love like mine?"

"But your father—"

"He will not object. Why should he? Is he not Oluski's best friend?"

"Yes, they are friends, but still—"

Warren saw that the girl was nervous and alarmed. He lost no time in reassuring her.

"And after all, dearest, we need not tell them of our love, until we are sure of their consent. In the mean time, let us think only of ourselves. You have not yet told me what I long to hear."

"What is that?"

"The whispering assurance that your heart is mine!"

A painful struggle was evidently taking place in the maiden's breast. Filial duty and self-reproach contended with that feeling nurtured by the soft blandishments of the scoundrel by her side.

In such a contest, love is always the victor. This case was not exceptional. Softly murmuring the young man's name, Sansuta hid her head upon his shoulder.

His arm enclasped her waist.

The confession had been made. The die was cast!

They were both startled by a sound heard near. It was like some one sighing. Warren, with the eye of a lynx, searched among the weeds and wild vines, and peered through the foliage on all sides, but saw nothing.

Reassuring her with honeyed words, he then led the girl away from the spot.

As soon as they had disappeared, a man's form was seen standing upon the place they had lately occupied, while another was visible at no great distance from it.

He who had first made his appearance seemed utterly bowed down with grief, while a cloud, black as night, was visible on his brow.

It was the chief, Wacora.

With an angry and contemptuous action, he flung some pieces of money to the other, who had followed him, and who was the negro, Crookleg.

"Begone! Wacora may use you for his revenge. You shall not witness his grief. Begone!"

The black picked up the coins, grinned hideously, and hobbled away.

Wacora stood for some time wrapped in his own sad thoughts; then, turning his back upon the old fort, he retraced his steps to Oluski's dwelling.

The old chief found but a dull guest in his nephew, during that and many succeeding days.

He would sit for hours seemingly lost to the consciousness of all that was passing around him.

Then, starting up suddenly, he would stride out of the dwelling with rapid steps, pass out of the town, and on to the adjoining woods, where, plunging into their depths, he would wander, to emerge from them hours after, sullen and abstracted as ever.

His anxiety to return to his own tribe seemed to have passed away; and day by day he deferred his departure on some trivial excuse for remaining.

He watched Sansuta's movements, however, with the jealous care a mother might exercise over her infant child. Every look, word, and action seemed to command his closest scrutiny.

The girl often trembled as she caught the young chief's eye gazing upon her. His stern demeanor agitated her. She suspected that he knew her secret, although neither by word or action did he betray the knowledge.

Oluski was amazed at his conduct. In their conversation there was a renewed bitterness when they talked of the pale-faces and their actions. It astonished the old Seminole chief. He could not understand the sudden growth of such an unjust antipathy, and therefore became more reticent, and would sit for hours without exchanging a word with his nephew.

Time passed in this manner until the period for the annual migration of the tribe to Tampa bay. To Oluski's surprise, Wacora signified his intention to accompany them, and along with them he went.

CHAPTER XIX.

A CHANGED SCENE.

A STILL greater surprise was in store for the Seminole chief and his tribe.

The Indians stood as if petrified when they came within sight of the well-known hill.

Upon its table-top, and visible for miles around, stood a frame mansion, in all the glitter of fresh paint.

When Oluski first saw it he uttered an exclamation of agonized anger, at the same time clutching hold of Wacora's arm. But for its friendly support he would have fallen to the ground.

"Look, Wacora! look yonder! What is it we see?"

As he spoke, he passed his hand across his eyes to shade off the sun.

No; they had not deceived him! There was no glamour over them. The sunbeams were shooting brightly upon a house!

His nephew looked sadly into the old man's face, fervently pressing his hand. He dared not trust himself to speak.

"And this is the act of a friend. So much for my blind faith in the traitor's deceitful words. May the curse of the Great Spirit fall upon him and his!"

Wacora added:

"Yes, may both be accursed!"

Then, drawing his uncle away from the contemplation of the painful sight, he conducted him to a neighboring grove of oaks, the tribe halting near the spot.

A council of the chief men was instantly called, and a plan of action resolved on.

Oluski and Wacora were commissioned to visit the white settlement, and demand the reason for this scandalous usurpation.

The Indians proceeded no further.

That night they encamped upon the spot where they had halted, and early next morning the two chiefs departed on their mission.

As they approached the hill another surprise awaited them.

Surrounding it was a strong wooden stockade, with substantially-built block-houses at regular distances from each other. Behind the palisading men were seen as if watching the approach, and ready to receive them in a hostile manner.

"See!" cried Wacora, "they are prepared for our reception. The robbers have determined to maintain themselves in their stolen possession."

"Yes, yes! I see. But let us not act rashly. We will first make an appeal in the name of justice. If they refuse that, then we must prove ourselves worthy the blood in our veins—worthy of our ancestors! Oh! I would rather be lying among them, in yonder graveyard, than that this should have arisen! The fault has been mine, and upon me let fall the punishment. Come on!"

They reached the central block-house, and were summoned to a halt by one of the settlers, who, gun in hand, stood by the entrance.

"Who are you? What do you want?"

Oluski answered:

"White man, go tell your Governor that Oluski, the Seminole chief, would speak with him!"

The sentinel answered sharply:

"The Governor is not here. He is at his house, and cannot be disturbed."

Wacora's hand clutched his tomahawk. Oluski, perceiving the act, laid hold of his nephew's arm.

"Patience, Wacora, patience! The time for bloodshed will come soon enough. For my sake be patient!"

Then, turning to the sentry, he continued, his eyes flashing in their sockets:

"Fool!" said he, "go with my message! The lives of hundreds may depend upon it. Tell your chief that I am here. Bring him instantly before me!"

The dignity of the old Indian's manner struck the man with respect. Perhaps the nervous twitching of Wacora's finger about the handle of his tomahawk had also its effect.

Calling out to a comrade who was near, and placing him at the post, he hastened off toward the house.

The two Indians, without exchanging speech, patiently awaited his return.

There was evidently some commotion within the frame dwelling at the reception of the news, as several men, well armed, were observed hurrying off in different directions, and taking station along the line of stockade.

Shortly after, the man who had been sent by Oluski was seen coming back.

Throwing open the strong slab door, he beckoned the two chiefs to enter.

They did so; and then, leading them inside the block-house, the man told them there to wait the "Governor's" arrival.

It was not long delayed. Elias Rody was seen coming forth from his new mansion, followed by five or six stalwart settlers.

All save himself carried rifles.

The Indians stood still as statues. They made no movement to lessen the distance between themselves and the white men. And at length Elias Rody and Oluski stood face to face.

A close observer might have detected signs of fear in the Governor's countenance. Despite his assumed boldness of bearing, he found it hard to look into the face of the man he had so cruelly wronged.

It was he, however, who first broke the silence, so painful to himself. "What does Oluski wish to say to me?"

"What is the meaning of this?" asked the chief, pointing to the mansion.

"That is my new residence!"

"By what right have you built it upon this ground?"

"By the right of possession—bought and paid for!"

Oluski started, as if a shot had struck him.

"Bought and paid for! Dog of a liar! What do you mean?"

"Only that I have built my house upon land purchased from you. Your memory appears bad, my old Indian friend!"

"Purchased from me? When? How?"

"Do you already forget the gun, blankets, powder and valuables I gave you in exchange for it? Fie! fie! you are trying to jest with me.

You must remember the transaction. If your memory fails you, these gentlemen"—here Rody pointed to the settlers—"these gentlemen are ready to confirm the truth of what I say."

Oluski groaned. The audacious treachery was beyond his belief!

Wacora, burning with indignation, replied:

"False wretch, the lie you would have these men swear to is too monstrous to be believed even were they upon their oaths. Those gifts thrust upon my uncle were as falsely bestowed as the lands he gave you were falsely claimed for service done to him. Your black heart never conceived a generous thought nor a just deed. All was for a treacherous end—the betrayal of the trust of a noble-minded chief, as much your superior as the Deity your race kneels to is above the white man himself. I spit at and despise you. Wacora has said it!"

He drew Oluski toward him and stood erect, proud in the consciousness of right, before the now-trembling Rody and his adherents.

The aged chief had recovered himself while his nephew was speaking.

"What Wacora said is good, and he only utters my thoughts. I came here ready to receive atonement for the wrong done me and my people. I now see that there is a blacker depth of treachery in your actions than that which has robbed a confiding man of his best-loved possession. I, Oluski, the Seminole, spit at and despise you. I have spoken!"

With a kingly dignity the old chief folded his blanket around him, and leaning on his nephew's arm, slowly departed from the spot.

Rody and his followers, as if transfixed by the withering contempt with which the Indians had treated them, suffered the two to depart without molestation.

They now redoubled their watchfulness, stationed additional sentinels around the stockade, and looked after the arms and ammunition with which they would no doubt have to defend the usurped possession.

The small cloud that had been slowly gathering over the settlement was growing dark and portentous. The soft breeze was rapidly rising to a storm.

The people of the settlement, alarmed by the news of the interview between Rody and the Indian chiefs, which spread rapidly among them, hastened to take measures for the safety of their families. The women and children were hurriedly brought in from the outlying plantations, and lodged in temporary abodes within the stockade, while provisions in plenty were carried to the same place.

The war-signal had sounded, and it would not be long before the work of carnage would commence.

CHAPTER XX.

STILL ANOTHER SORROW.

DISAPPOINTED and chafed, the two chiefs returned in all haste to the Indian encampment.

But few words had been spoken between them on their way from the hill. A firm pressure of his uncle's hand was proof that Wacora, once embarked in the impending contest, would remain faithful to its end.

It needs no speech among true men to establish confidence in their devotion. Between the two chiefs it was mutual.

As they neared the spot where the tribe had pitched their tents, an unusual excitement was observable. Men and women were conversing in little groups, animated, apparently, by the receipt of some startling news.

The two chiefs at first imagined that the result of their interview was already known; but, on reflection, the impossibility of the thing became apparent to them, and their surprise was extreme.

All at once they saw Nelatee hastening toward them.

The young man seemed ready to drop, as if from fatigue. His looks told that he was a prey to the keenest anxiety.

On arriving before the two chiefs, he was for some moments unable to speak.

Words rose to his tongue, but they found no articulate utterance. His lips seemed glued together. Drops of sweat glistened upon his brow.

The father, with a dreadful prescience of new sorrows, trembled at the sight of his son.

"Nelatee," he said, "what anguish awaits me?—of what fresh disaster do you bring tidings? Speak! speak!"

The young Indian again essayed, but only succeeded in muttering "Sansuta."

"Sansuta! What of her? Is she dead? Answer me!"

"No, she is not dead! Oh, father! be calm—have courage—she is—"

"Speak, boy, or I shall go mad. What of her?"

"She is gone."

"Gone?—whither?"

"I have sought her everywhere. I only heard of her departure after you left the encampment. Bury your tomahawk in my brain, if you will, for I have been the cause."

"What does the boy rave about? What does it all mean? Has the Great Spirit cursed me in all my hopes? Speak, Nelatee—where is your sister! You say she is gone. Gone! With whom?"

"With Warren Rody!"

Oluski uttered a shriek of mingled rage and grief, pressed his hand upon his heart, and reeling, would have fallen to the earth but for Wacora's arm, at that instant thrown around him.

The two young men bent over his prostrate form, which his nephew had gently laid upon the sword.

A few faint, murmuring words escaped from his lips—so faint, indeed, that they were not comprehended by either son or nephew.

The frown which had gathered on his brow in his interview with Elias Rody gradually gave place to a gentle smile. His eyes for an instant rested sorrowfully on the face of Nelatee, then on Wacora, and were closed forever.

With that look had his life ended. The spirit of the Seminole chief had departed for a better land!

Wounded in his friendship, doubly wounded in his pride, cruelly stabbed by the desertion of his own daughter and the weakness of his own son, outraged as friend and father, the old man's heart had burst within his bosom!

Tenderly covering the body with his blanket, Wacora stooped and kissed the cold brow, in silence registering a vow of vengeance upon his murderers!

Nelatee, stunned by the suddenness of the event, hid his face in his hands, and gave way to lamentation and tears.

That evening the remains of their chief were interred in a temporary grave, around which the warriors of the tribe, by their own consent, now commanded by Wacora, joined in an oath of sure and ample vengeance. Coupled with their oath was the declaration that war and rapine should not cease until the bill was again their own, and the body of their beloved chief laid peacefully beside the bones of his ancestors.

That night the red pole was erected in their encampment, and under the glare of pine torches was performed around it the fearful scalp-dance of the tribe.

The white sentinels upon the hill saw afar off the flend-like performance; and as that wild shriek echoed in their ears, they turned trembling from the sight and cursed Elias Rody.

CHAPTER XXI.

WACORA CHOSEN CHIEF.

WACORA was unanimously elected war-chief of the tribe over which his uncle had long ruled. Nelatee's claims were so slight, his ability so deficient, that not one of the warriors wished to nominate him for the important position.

To Wacora the honor was of inestimable value. By its means there was now a hope for the realization of his long-cherished design—the redemption of the red-man by the union of all the tribes into one powerful nation.

He instantly dispatched messengers to the braves of his own sub-tribe, summoning them to Tampa bay, to take part in the approaching conflict.

He was answered by the speedy arrival of a large and well-armed force, who, mingling with Oluski's people, now became one community.

With unremitting care, Wacora impressed upon them the necessity of caution and reserve, pointing out to them the value of abstaining from active measures until preparations could be made to insure success.

Obedient to his mandate, they continued to preserve an ominously-peaceful attitude toward the settlers, who, but for a knowledge to the contrary, might have comforted themselves with the belief that the red-men had left the bay.

But although unseen, their presence was not unfelt. The news of Oluski's death had spread a feeling of alarm among the colonists, which the heartless and assumed indifference of Elias Rody and his adherents could not dismiss from their minds.

The "Governor" seemed to have returned to the courses of his early life. He had for many years been a man of sober habits; but, since the building of his new house, a change had come over him. He had begun to drink freely, and in the excitement of preparation for the defense of his usurped property, he found a thousand excuses for indulgence of that appetite so long kept under control.

The truth is that Oluski's death had touched him in a tender point. He seemed to see in it a presentiment of evil to himself. The calm, kindly face of the old chief, as he remembered it before his cruel deception of him, often rose before his imagination with a sad, reproachful look. Even drink could not dispel the impression.

When a man begins to go to the bad it is the easiest thing in the world to find companions. Rody had them for the choosing, for—thanks to the constant alarm in which the settlers lived—no regular industrial pursuits could be followed, and many, having nothing else to do, were ready enough to drink and carouse with their unscrupulous leader.

Still another matter gave discomfort to the Governor. His son had been some time missing from the settlement, and in a mysterious manner.

His disappearance had a marked effect upon his father's temper, and when not cursing himself for the general discomfort he had caused, he cursed the son for adding to it!

It will thus be seen that, although Elias Rody had prepared his own bed, and was obliged to lie upon it, it was proving anything but a bed of roses.

Had it not been for the presence of his daughter, Alice, the new mansion, in which he now lived, and for which he might yet have to pay dearly, would have been a perfect pandemonium to him.

That amiable girl, by her gentle behavior, did much to soften the rude, inharmonious elements around her, and the roughest of her father's roystering companions were silent and respectful in her presence.

She was like an angel among those who had taken refuge within the stockade. She never seemed to tire of attending upon them or their wants. Her kind, sympathetic voice, and assiduous care, were of inestimable service to the sick, who blessed her in their hearts.

But, though busied night and day, she still found time for many a spell of bitter lamenting. The home which might have been so happy, seemed accursed.

To her father, she was still gentle and affectionate, but could not hide from him a certain look of mingled reproach and regret, as she listened to his outbursts of feigned mirth.

Whenever he caught that look bent upon him, his spirit sunk, and he would mentally resolve upon a change of life.

The next glass, however, would banish the fleeting remorse and in the pleasure of the moment he endeavored to drown alike his memories of the past and his fears for the future.

His daughter saw his dissipation with increasing uneasiness. She knew she was unable to prevent it.

Nothing, in the mean time, had been heard of her brother Warren.

Crookleg had also disappeared, although no one particularly missed him.

Cris Carrol, the hunter, had not returned to the settlement. In some distant savanna he was, no doubt, tranquilly passing his time at peace with all the world.

Such was the condition of affairs.

The first preparations for strife between the whites and Indians had been made; and, to several other outrages, similar to that committed by Elias Rody, may be traced the causes of that Seminole war, which cost the Government of the United States some thousands of lives, along with several millions of dollars, to say naught of the reputation of six hitherto distinguished generals.

CHAPTER XXII.

A CONVERSATION BETWEEN COUSINS.

THIS tranquil state of affairs did not last long.

The Indians, eager to avenge Oluski's death, were impatient of the restraint Wacora would have imposed upon them; and, at a council convened for that purpose, they determined to attack the stockade upon the hill.

This determination was hastened by several rencontres which had taken place in the outlying districts.

A small party of the red-men, led by Marocota, had pillaged and destroyed a plantation near the bay. They had been met by some of the white settlers as they were returning from their work of destruction.

In the melee which ensued, a number of Indians were killed, while their white adversaries met with little loss.

These and some individual cases of contest had worked the red-men up to a pitch of savage earnestness that took all Wacora's temporizing power to restrain. He knew the character of the people he had to deal with too well to hazard opposition to their will, the more so as his own desire for vengeance was as deep and earnest, but more deadly than theirs.

One thought occupied his mind nobler than that of revenge—the regeneration of the Indian race.

A chimera it may have been, but still, his was a great ambition.

He thus spoke to the assembled chiefs:

"I do not urge upon you to withhold vengeance for injuries done to our race by the white enemy; I only desire to make it more full and terrible. What Elias Rody has done to you has been done to our people ever since the white man set foot upon the continent. The Indian has been in every instance the oppressed; the pale-face the oppressor. Revenge is sweet. Let us take for our text one from their own sacred book, with which they try to Christianize our people, while holding a rifle to their breast: 'An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth.' Follow that advice, but accomplish more, for we have more than our own injuries to revenge—we have those of the entire Indian race. This is but the beginning of a long list of retributions, the overflowing of accumulated wrongs, the first step toward freedom and redemption. To take that step, we must be patient, until certain of success. Then begins a warfare that will only end with the annihilation of our hated enemies, and in a new existence for the red-man! Have I spoken well?"

Loud approbation greeted him from the assembled warriors, but such is the inconsistency of human character that individually they devised means for immediate retaliation on the settlers.

Hence the several encounters which had already taken place.

Nelatee, mortified at his own weakness, was among the warriors addressed by Wacora.

On returning from the council, the young chief approached his cousin.

"Nelatee, you would do something to make up for your blind infatuation that has led to such misfortunes?"

"I would, Wacora; I would! My father's face seems always before me, reproaching me as my sister's destroyer."

"Then action is the only way by which to shake off this remorseful feeling. Our efforts have, till now, been fruitless in tracing the spot to which your sister has been carried. She must be found, and the punishment of the guilty made sure."

"Not Sansuta; you would not injure her?"

Wacora smiled sadly, as he pressed his hand upon his heart.

"No, Nelatee, I would not injure your sister. Alas! I had already learned to love her. Her fate is sad, but her punishment has already come upon her. I would not hurt her for worlds; it is the wretch who has ruined her. I would have him suffer a thousand deaths, and every death more terrible than the other."

"Tell me, what can I do? If I remain idle, I shall die!"

"Take three or four of my own people; follow every trail that promises to lead to where they are concealed, and, having found the monster, bring him to me alive!"

Wacora's eyes, as he uttered these words, blazed with passion.

"I would rather go alone," said Nelatee.

"As you please; but, remember, that there is one man you dare not trust, and yet he may be the means of finding Sansuta and her abductor."

"His name?"

"Crookleg, the negro."

"But he, too, is missing."

"I know it, and therefore he can lead you to their hiding-place, if he can be found. With Crookleg to assist you, you may succeed in the task—without him, your search will be fruitless."

"How am I to find him?"

"By diligent search. He is not near this spot, but yet not so distant as to be ignorant of what is passing. He has the cunning of the wild-cat; remember that!"

"I will be a match for him! Never fear, cousin!"

Wacora glanced pityingly at the simple youth. He thought of his confiding nature, and felt that if the only chance of finding Sansuta lay in his cunning, she would never be discovered.

"Well, Nelatee, I have given you the best advice I can. Will you undertake the search?"

"I will!"

"When?"

"At once, Wacora."

"Come to my tent before you start. I may be able to furnish information that will assist you."

With these words, the cousins separated.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE STRAYED CANOE.

THAT night Nelatee left the Indian camp.

Wacora had given him a few hints by which he thought his search for Crookleg might be facilitated.

He had suggested the probability that the negro lay hid within the neighboring swamp.

This wilderness, difficult to traverse, was of great extent. It was only by a knowledge of its intricate paths that it could be successfully explored.

Nelatee, fully appreciating the difficulty of his undertaking was more than usually depressed.

His journey through the tract of dry timber was easy enough.

On emerging from it, he found himself in a broad savanna.

On the other side of this lay the swamp to which Wacora had directed him.

Its gloomy appearance struck a chill to the young chief's heart.

Could it by any possibility be the place selected by Warren for Sansuta's concealment? He almost hoped his search for her in its somber fastnesses might prove futile.

Its aspect was especially forbidding at the time Nelatee reached it, which was in the early morning.

A heavy fog rose from its dark waters, clinging around the rank vegetation, and veiling the mosses and spectral limbs of the decayed trees. A fetid breath exhaled from the thick undergrowth, and the air seemed charged with poison.

No note of bird was heard. No bloom of flower seen. Death in life was everywhere apparent!

Carefully, and with the quick natural instinct of his race, Sansuta's brother struck upon a well-defined trail, leading inwardly from the borders of the morass. Following this with care, he had soon made considerable progress.

The sun rising higher, as he advanced, only revealed more clearly the gloomy character of the scene.

The thick mist became dispelled; the verdure, dark but rich, glistened with drops of moisture, and the ghostly moss waved to and fro, stirred by a gentle breeze that had helped to dissipate the fog.

With the brighter sky, however, there came a corresponding lightness over the young man's spirit; and a doubt arose in his mind as to the guilt of his former friend.

"I cannot believe all that he has been accused of. Perhaps he is not guilty of carrying off Sansuta. I always trusted him. Why should he be so evil, without a suspicion having crossed my mind. He has not been seen since she disappeared; but yet, Crookleg may be the guilty one. If all I have been told be true, and Warren be the man, he shall bitterly pay for his crime. But I will not believe it until I am convinced."

It will be seen that Nelatee was still a firm friend, ready to doubt even villainy.

Suddenly the trail he was following came to an end. A black lagoon was before his feet.

Its unrippled bosom showed it to be deep. Here and there jagged cypress stumps stood out of it, to which clung drooping parasites.

Nelatee felt that the trail he had followed was purposely terminated at the edge of the lake, doubtless to be discovered on its opposite shore.

How to cross it—that was the question.

Stooping, he scanned the shore, but failed to trace any further evidence of the footsteps of man.

He was on the point of retracing his path in order to look for tracks, when he was arrested by a faint sound, as from a movement in the water.

It was very faint, but unmistakable in its character.

It was the stroke of an oar.

He strained his eyes to catch a view of the boat, which he felt sure was traversing the lake.

After some time spent in the endeavor, his scrutiny was rewarded.

A strange tableau was revealed to him.

At a distance appeared the shadowy form of a canoe, in which three figures were seated. The fog, like a dull silver veil, was still spread over the lagoon, and his efforts to recognize the phantom-like forms were unavailing.

The intervening curtain of vapor baffled even the keen eyesight of an Indian.

He hallooed to the spectral figures until the swamp re-echoed his shouts.

In vain.

No response came from the silent voyagers.

He fancied that the measured pulling of the oars for an instant ceased; but, so dim and unreal did it all appear, that he began to doubt the evidence of his senses.

As he gazed, the canoe glided silently out of sight.

Muttering an angry adjuration at the ghostly oarsmen, he threw himself upon the ground.

Overcome with the fatiguing journey, and dispirited by his fruitless search, he soon fell into a deep slumber.

The last film of the fog was now dispelled by the powerful rays of the sun. Birds sung in the trees about him, and from the black waters of the lagoon a huge cayman crawled up the banks to bask in the noontide glare.

Still Nelatee slumbered.

He slept until the meridian heat had passed, and the evening approached, seeming to lull all nature into silence.

The young man's sleep was placid. With his head pillowed on his arm, he lay like one dead.

From sweet unconsciousness, he awoke with a start.

A rippling sound, as of some craft cleaving the water, once more fell upon his ear.

Had the phantom canoe returned?

A glance answered the question.

Drifting near the shore was an empty dug-out.

The broken manila cord dragging at the stern, told him why it was adrift.

Without hesitation he plunged into the water, and with a few strokes reached the straying craft.

Scrambling into it he seized an oar found lying in its bottom, and paddled back to the place whence he had started! Placing his gun ready beside him, he again pushed off, and rowed to the center of the lake, steering his course as nearly as he could remember in the direction which, in the morning, he had observed the canoe to take.

The spot, as he had marked it, was near a huge cypress-tree.

It proved to be a greater distance than he thought, and the sun had well sunk in the western sky before he arrived at it!

Once there, he came to a stop. Those he sought had evidently either gone further out into the open water of the lagoon, or had made for one or the other of the numerous narrow canals which debouched into it.

Selecting that which appeared of greatest width, he once more plied his oar and advanced toward it.

CHAPTER XXIV.

A SMOKE INTERRUPTED.

ALTHOUGH Cris Carrol was absent from the immediate neighborhood of the settlement, he was none the less informed of what had happened since his departure.

Several of the colonists, alarmed at the prospect of affairs, had quietly left Tampa bay, and meeting with the hunter, had told him of the events that had happened within the past month.

The backwoodsman's foresight had not deceived him.

The whites, by which he meant Elias and his followers, had not heeded his advice, and "WORSE HAD COME OF IT."

The hunter was nothing if not oracular.

"Wal," said he, "Governor Rody thought himself smart when he set to work buildin' that thar frame house of his'n on the red-man's ground, but I reckon he'll pay for it yet in bloody scalps and broken bones. Confound the old cormorant; his doin's will cause all them poor white settlers no end of trouble. It don't bear thinkin' on, that it don't. As for his black-hearted whelp of a son, darn me if I wouldn't like to put an ounce o' lead into his carcass, if it war only to larn him some human feelin'."

"But won't you go back to the settlement now, and see if your presence can do any good?"

To this question, propounded by one of the fugitive settlers, Cris answered:

"Good! What good can I do now? No, lad, the fat's in the fire this time, and maybe I may better help some poor critter away from the place than anigh it. I'll tell ye what it is, and it ain't no use denyin' it, them thar red devils means mischief, and that old cuss Rody knows it by this time. The chief, Oluski, what you tell me air dead, war worth a whole settlement of Rody's—barrin' one—that is, barrin' one."

"And who may that be?"

"Who, but his darter. The most beautiful gal that this coon ever set eyes on. Bless her, I hope no hurt won't come to her. And there sha'n't, if Cris Carrol can prevent it."

In this manner did the honest hunter comment on the alarming news brought by the fugitives from Tampa bay.

Not that he approached the spot too closely. No; he had formed an idea of the manner in which he might be most useful; and to do so he must carefully avoid any appearance of interfering between the contending parties.

He therefore pursued his occupation of hunting; but contrived materially to narrow the circle of his excursions.

Often, as the image of Alice Rody presented itself to his mind, he would heave a painful sigh.

"How such a gal came to be a child of that old trait'rous heathen is more nor I can reckon up. It's one of them thar things as philosophers call 'startlers.'"

In one of these moralizing moods, the old hunter was seated on a tree-stump on the afternoon of a day that had been more than usually fatiguing to him.

He knocked the ashes from his pipe, took a plug of tobacco from his pouch, and began to cut up a supply for another smoke.

"Ah!" muttered he, shaking his head, "I remember the time when there was happiness in these savannas, and when them red-skins were ready to help the white men rather than fight ag'in' them. Them times is gone from hyar forever."

He struck a light with his flint, and applied it to his pipe.

Just as he had puffed two or three small clouds of smoke, and was preparing to enjoy himself to the fullest extent, a flash suddenly appeared, the pipe was knocked out of his mouth and the whizz of a bullet sounded in his ears.

To grasp his rifle, and shelter himself behind a tree, on the side opposite to that from which the shot proceeded, was but the work of an instant.

"Red-skins, by the eternal! I know it by the twang of that rough-cast bullet."

Whether red-skins or white men he did not find it easy to be certain, although he was up to every move in such an emergency.

He knew that to look in the direction of the shot was to expose himself to almost certain death.

He listened with breathless anxiety for the slightest sound which might give evidence of the movements of the enemy.

All remained perfectly still.

Adopting a very old ruse, he stuck his skin

cap upon the barrel of his rifle, and held it out a few inches beyond the trunk of the tree, by the side of which he had ensconced himself.

A flash, a report, and it was pierced by a bullet.

He was now fully satisfied that there was but one enemy with whom he had to cope.

Had there been more, the first bullet which struck the pipe from his mouth would have been followed by another, as quickly, but perhaps more surely aimed.

With a rapid glance he surveyed the ground behind him. It was covered with undergrowth and fallen timber.

His resolution was at once taken.

He fell flat upon the earth, and noiselessly gliding along, reached a tree distant some paces, and in an oblique direction from the one he had left.

From that spot he made his way to another, at a greater angle, and about equi-distant from the second.

These movements were effected with such agile stealthiness as to be entirely unperceived by his still unseen enemy.

By the change of position he now commanded a side view of his unknown antagonist, who, unsuspecting of it, was keeping a close watch upon Carrol's supposed shelter.

To raise his rifle to his shoulder was a natural action of the old hunter.

Instead of pulling the trigger, however, some idea seemed to cross his mind, and pausing, he scanned his adversary.

He saw it was Marocota who had fired at him.

Carrol knew Marocota—a faithful and devoted follower of the late chief—and he felt loth to take his life, although he might easily have done so.

The better thought prevailed. He felt convinced that the bullet fired by the Indian had been aimed in reality at one for whom Marocota had mistaken him.

Advancing cautiously toward the unconscious warrior, the old backwoodsman crept from tree to tree, until he was close upon him.

Not anticipating an attack from the rear, and still fancying he commanded the hiding-place of the white man, Marocota, spite of his Indian cunning, was completely in the white man's power.

A loud shout, a quick bound, and Carrol had him in his grasp.

With one hand upon his throat, the hunter had pinned him to the earth.

"Not a word, you darned catamount, or I'll run my knife into your ribs. So you thought to circumvent me, did ye, with your Injin trachery? What would you say, now, if I war to raise your ha'r, 'stead of lettin' you take myen?"

Marocota could make no reply to the question, as the pressure on his throat stopped his breath as well as speech.

The backwoodsman saw by the expression upon the Indian's face that his own surmise had been correct. He was not the victim Marocota would have doomed to death.

It was a mistake; but rather a serious one.

Loosening his hold, he suffered the astonished Marocota to rise to his feet.

"Yes, I kin tell you've made a random shot at me. Next time, try and see a man's face 'fore you pulls trigger on him, or it might be awkward! There's no harm done! Only a worse shot nor yours I never saw. I'd eat my rifle, stock, lock and barrel, afore I'd own to sich shootin'. Who war it ye wur arter?"

Having at length recovered breath, the Indian was able to answer:

"I took you for Warren Rody."

"Much obleeged for the compliment. Do I look sich a skunk as that fellow? If I do, put a brace of bullets into me, and we won't quarrel."

The warrior grimly smiled.

"Marocota has sworn to avenge Oluski's death—Warren Rody must die!"

"Wal, let him! I sha'n't stop you from ridin' the world of such as he. What made you follow my trail?"

"It was no trail I followed. I have been seeking one from the north; yours came from the east."

"Right you air; that's whar I hail from last."

"Have you seen anything of him, or of Sansuta?"

"Look hyar, Injin, although I might draw bead on the scoundrel if I saw him, I ain't a man-hunter, and that's why I hain't been a-follerin' any trail of his'n."

Marocota's eager look gave place to one of despondency, as he muttered:

"Not found yet! where can they be?"

"Ab, whar! It ain't Warren as has hid whar he can't be found. Some knowin' hand has put him up to it."

"Yes, Marocota thinks so. It must be the negro, Crookleg!"

"Crookleg? Is that all-fired nigger varmint mixed up with him? That makes a brace of the durnedest bounds as ever run together. Who told you Crookleg helped young Rody?"

"The chief thinks so!"

"Wal, then, I'll bet a 'possum-skin ag'in' a muskrat's that he's right. Y'ur chief Wacora's as likely an Injin at reckonin' up the merits o' a case as this cown knows on. Now, you've missed takin' my scalp, what do ye intend doin'?"

"Go on looking for the thief who stole Oluski's heart. Find him and kill him."

The glance that accompanied these words was full of deadly determination.

"Wal, go, and good luck attend ye. Don't ask me to jine ye. I tell you I ain't no man-hunter, nor never will be; only if either of them thar scamps should be out walkin' whar I chance to be, they better have met with a mad bar than this hyar Cris Carrol. Never mind sayin' a word about that bad shot of yours. The moment I see'd you I knowed you didn't mean it for me, only next time be more partik'lar, that's all!"

Without making reply, Marocota turned away, and was soon lost under the shadow of the forest.

As soon as he was out of sight, the old hunter renewed his preparations for a smoke. Drawing from his pouch (which seemed to contain everything that heart of hunter could desire) another pipe, he was soon once more sending clouds of blue smoke up into the air.

"If that Marocota meets Warren Rody or Crookleg, he'll be an awkward customer to either or both on 'em, and that he may meet 'em, he has Cris Carrol's best prayers an' wishes."

With this homely but sincere expression of his desires, the backwoodsman ceased to think of the deadly danger so lately threatening himself.

CHAPTER XXV.

PREPARING FOR THE ATTACK.

THE Indians had at length determined upon making an attack upon Elias Rody's stronghold.

The Governor had got wind of their intention through a spy, a slave belonging to the tribe, who had turned informer through his seductive offers.

A meeting of the settlers within the stockade was at once called.

"Fellow-citizens," said Rody, addressing them; "I have received sure information that our enemies have resolved upon attacking us. It is my duty to tell you this, in order that every man may be prepared to defend himself and his family. We must be vigilant, as they are treacherous. The stockade is strong, and the block-houses which we have built will resist a long siege from savages. Our provisions are plentiful, and we have but to hold out in order to conquer."

"How many red-skins do you think there are?" asked a voice in the crowd.

"I cannot say for certain," the Governor replied; "they outnumber us, I know, but a white man should be worth a dozen red ones!"

"Ain't so sure of that!" was the rejoinder.

"One thing, gentlemen, I would have you remember. This war will be one of extermination, therefore be careful not to waste a bullet; let every pull upon your triggers send an Indian to his long account. Let the cry be 'No quarter!'"

"Perhaps that'll be their motto, too," remarked the same speaker.

"I perceive, sir," replied Rody, a little nettled at the running commentary on his speech, "I perceive that there are still one or two dissatisfied people among us. Let them step forward and declare themselves. We want neither renegades nor traitors in our midst."

"That's so!" the voice replied.

"Again I say, let those displeased with my views step boldly out, and allow me to answer any objections they may raise. I've done nothing I am ashamed of. I blush for nothing that I do."

"No, you're past blushing!" was the ironical rejoinder.

A suppressed titter ran round the assemblage at these pertinent remarks of the unknown, and the Governor's temper was not improved by observing the effect the words had produced on his hearers.

"I scorn to answer the fellow who is afraid to show himself. But I warn you all, be prepared for a desperate contest. We have only ourselves to look to for our defense. We are in the hands of Providence."

"We are!"

This sudden change, from jeering comment to deep solemnity of utterance, on the part of the unknown speaker, struck awe into the crowd, and caused Rody to turn pale.

"In the hands of Providence!"

"Yes, for good or evil—for punishment or reward."

The thought expressed in this manner was too much for the Governor. He dismissed the meeting with a hurried admonition to be prepared for the worst.

As he re-entered his house, he encountered his daughter, face to face.

"Father, I was about to seek you," said she. "They tell me that you have heard bad news!"

"Bad enough, girl; the red-skins are going to attack us!"

"Is there no hope?"

"Hope—for what?"

"That this bloodshed may be avoided. Will they not listen to an offer of reconciliation?"

"And who would dare to make it?"

"Dare? Father, I do not understand you. It is the duty of those who have done wrong to try by concessions to atone for it, and, if possible, make peace."

"And who has done wrong?"

Alice did not answer in words, but the look she bestowed upon her father was eloquence itself.

"I see what you're thinking about, my girl. It's hard that inside of my own house I should meet with reproaches. Isn't it enough for me to have to bear the sneers and taunts of others, without being forced to listen to them from you?"

"Father!"

"Oh, yes; now you'll try to say you didn't mean to reproach me, but it won't do. I see it in your face, and—there, your eyes are full of tears. That's the way with you girls; when you can't use your tongues, you have always a stock of tears ready. But blubbering won't mend this matter, it's got to be settled with blows."

"Oh, father! Can nothing be done?"

"Nothing but prepare for the worst. Now, girl! stop your crying, or you'll drive me stark mad. I'll tell you what it is, I'm just in that sort of state that if I don't do something, I shall go clean out of my mind. What with the worrying work here, and the grumbling discontent of a few paltry hounds about the settlement, I don't know how I keep my senses about me."

The angry mood into which he had worked himself, was, however, no novelty to his daughter. She had of late seen it too often, and sorrowfully noted the change.

Still she was a brave girl, and knowing she had a duty to perform, she did it fearlessly.

"Oh, father!" she exclaimed, apologizingly; "I did not mean to reproach you. If my looks betrayed my thoughts, I cannot help them, much as I regret giving you pain. What I wanted to say was that if there is any honorable way to avoid this bloodshed, it should be tried; there is no disgrace in acknowledging a fault."

"Who has committed one?"

"You know wrongs have been done by white people against the Indians, not alone now, but ever since the two races have been brought together. We are no better than others, but we can avoid their errors by trying to remedy the grievances they complain of."

Old Rody stamped the floor with rage. His daughter's remarks made him wince. Conscience, which he deemed asleep, was at work, and upon the tongue of his own child had found utterance.

"Begone, girl!" he cried, "before I forget that you are my flesh and blood. You insult me beyond endurance. I will manage my affairs my own way, without impediment from you. Ay, not only my own affairs, but the affairs of all here. I will have blind obedience. I demand it, and will exact it. Begone!"

His daughter looked him boldly in the face.

"Be it so, father," she answered, firmly. "I have done my duty; will always do it. Think, however, before it is too late, that to your conduct in the matter the groans of widows and the sighs of orphans may be laid. The happiness or misery of many rests upon your single word. It is an awful risk. Reflect upon it, dear father, reflect!"

Her proud bearing gave place to tears. Her womanly heart was full to overflowing. It conquered her spirit for a time and, as she parted from her father's presence, she felt that the last hope of peace had vanished.

"By the eternal powers," cried he, "this will prove too much for me. It must come to an end!"

As Rody uttered these words, he drew from his pocket a flask, and applied it to his lips.

It was a bottle of brandy. It seemed the last friend left him.

CHAPTER XXVI.

FORCED INTO SERVICE.

AFTER entering the narrow stretch of water, Nelatee for some time plied his paddle with vigor.

He there paused to examine the place.

Ledges and canebreaks grew thickly down to the water's edge. There appeared no further passage through them.

Resuming his course he attentively watched for any sign of habitation, but for a long time without success.

Just as he was about turning the head of the canoe again in the direction of the lagoon, an object, floating on the surface, attracted his attention.

It was an oar. A glance convinced him that it was the fellow of the one he held in his hand.

Reanimated by this assuring proof that he was going in the right direction, he fished it up, and abandoning the more laborious mode of paddling, he adjusted the two oars in the row-locks, and bending to them, made more rapid way. He kept his eye turning to right and left on the lookout for a landing-place, which he now felt assured could not be far distant.

His scrutiny was at length rewarded.

A few hundred yards from where he had picked up the floating oar, a post was sticking up out of the bank.

To this was attached a manila rope, the broken strands of which showed it to be the other portion of that fastened to the stern of the canoe.

The clew was found. Those he had dimly seen in the morning, were doubtless close at hand.

He ran the craft inshore, fastened it securely to the post, and landed.

With cautious steps he followed the foot-prints now seen in the soft mud of the bank.

They led to a sheltered spot, upon which a rude hut had been erected.

The sound of a man's voice arrested his steps.

"He, he! I 'clare it makes dis chile laugh to tink about de trubble dat's brewin' for dem. De long time am comin' at last. It's been a-waitin' for it, but it am comin' now."

It was Crookleg who spoke, but for the time he said no more.

A stunning blow from Nelatee's clubbed rifle, which would have crushed any skull but that of a negro, felled him senseless to the ground.

On recovering consciousness, he found himself bound in a most artistic manner by thongs of deerskin, which Nelatee had found near the hut.

"Hush!" said the Indian, in a half-whisper. "Not a word except to answer my questions. Don't move, dog, or I'll dash out your brains!"

The negro trembled in every limb.

"Is Warren Rody inside that hut?"

Crookleg shook his head.

"Where is he?"

"Don't know, Massa Injin, don't know nuffin' 'bout him!"

"Liar!"

"By him bressed life, massa, dis chile don't know."

"Answer me—where is Warren Rody? I give you one chance for your wretched life. Tell me where is Warren Rody?"

The raising of a tomahawk above the negro's head, convinced him that death would be the sure reward of his denial.

"Don't, massa, don't kill de ole nigga. He'll tell you all he knows. Oh! don't kill him!"

"Speak!"

"He war here, but he am gone!"

"Where?"

"Out ob de swamp, into de woods."

"And Sansuta?"

"De gal am gone 'long wid him."

Nelatee groaned. Warren, then, was guilty.

"Do you know me?" he asked.

"Oh, yes, massa, I knows you well. You am Sansuta's brudder. I tole Warren he war a-doin' wrong, but he am so headstrong, he would take your sister. Dis chile's begged him not to do it."

"False dog, you are deceiving me!"

"I swear, Massa Latee, I's speakin' de bressed trufe."

Not deigning to reply, the Indian strode on to the hut, and entered it.

It was deserted. A bead bracelet lying inside attested to the truth of that portion of Crookleg's story which told him that his sister had been there.

He returned to the negro.

"Rise!" he said, in a commanding tone.

"I can't, massa. You has tied me so tight, I can't move."

"Rise, I tell you!" repeated the Indian with a threatening gesture.

Feigning to obey, the negro rolled over on the ground, in the direction of the rifle which Nelatee had laid aside in order to tie him.

Could he but reach that, he might defy his captor.

But the Indian was too quick for him. With a kick which made Crookleg howl with pain, he forced him on his side and secured the weapon himself.

Seeing that his only chance was submission, the negro got on his feet with some difficulty, and stood awaiting further orders.

Nelatee now unfastened the thongs that bound him.

"Go before me!" he said.

Crookleg hobbled forward with a demoniac look upon his face.

They reached the water's edge.

"Is that your canoe?"

"Yes, massa, dat dug-out b'long to me."

"You were upon the lake this morning?"

Crookleg nodded in the affirmative.

"Get in!"

The black scrambled into the stern.

"Not there—the other end."

Crookleg obeyed.

Nelatee took the vacated seat.

"Now lay hold of these oars, bend your back, and row me to the place where you landed Warren Rody and my sister. Remember that if you make the slightest attempt to deceive me, I will bury this deep in your brain!"

As he spoke he held his tomahawk aloft.

Thus admonished, the negro plied the oars, and the canoe darted rapidly through the water.

CHAPTER XXVII. THE LOST SISTER.

FOR more than an hour Crookleg was compelled to use the oars, until they had reached the other side of the lagoon.

Nelatee, silent and wrapt in his own gloomy thoughts, watched his every motion.

It was twilight when they made a landing, within a sheltered bay upon that side of the swamp nearest the settlement.

Beyond this lay the woods of which the negro had spoken.

Compelling the black to precede him, Nelatee urged him forward until they had reached a mound covered with bushes.

"Hush, Massa Injin; we am near de place."

"I see no signs of habitation."

"We is near it for all dat. It ain't a easy t'ing to find a place like dis 'ere whar dere am nuffin' to show but de ground and dese 'ere bushes!"

"Quick, lead me to the place!"

"By'm-by, massa. For a mercy's sake hab jist a little patience. 'Twon't do no good to be in a hurry—'twon't indeed!"

Suspecting treachery, Nelatee would hear of no delay.

"Remember, slave, what I threatened you with! Conduct me at once to their hiding-place!"

"Well, den, Massa Injin, if you must go step light, or we'll gib Massa Warren de alarm. He's quick-eared as a rabbit, dat he am, and he may shoot us both afore we know—dat is if he 'spects you am comin' after de gal."

With this caution, to which his companion silently agreed, they skirted the mound to its extreme end, where it seemed to terminate abruptly in a deep chasm.

Once there, Crookleg threw himself upon the ground, motioning the Indian to do the same.

Nelatee complied, still watching for any movement of betrayal on the part of his guide.

With a stealthy hand the negro parted the bushes, and signed to the young man to look through the opening.

He did so.

Before his eyes was the entrance of a cave, or grotto.

Inside the entrance, a pine torch stuck in the ground illumined a portion of the interior.

The light was obscured by the bushes, and it was only when these were parted that it became visible.

Inside the grotto was Sansuta. She was reposing upon a bed of moss.

Behind her, upon a large boulder of rock, sat Warren Rody!

Nelatee was on the point of rushing forward, when he was stayed by the negro's hand clutching his arm.

"Not yet, massa," he whispered; "you'd be shot afore you'd get two steps in dar, and dis poor ole nigga would nebba get away 'gain. Let me go speak first, an' gib Mass' Rody de signal, and den I'll find a way to bring him out to you. Don't you see that'll be the best plan to fix him?"

"I can not trust you from my sight. Take your hand off my arm! Let me go!"

"Oh, massa, I shall be ruined, and murdered complete. Don't you see that afore you could reach him he'd see you and fire? De ole nigga's plan am de best. Let me bring the fox out ob his hole!"

Crookleg spoke reasonably. Nelatee might, it is true, have easily killed Warren from where he lay; but his sister's presence, Wacora's command, and a certain reluctance to shed blood, stayed his hand.

"Well, then, do it; but on conditions—"

"What condishuns, Massa Injin? Name 'em, an' I's obey."

"That you bring him away from my sister's side, out here into the open ground—that every word you speak shall be loud enough for me to hear. Go!"

"I'll go, massa."

"See!"

As Nelatee uttered this monosyllable, he tapped his rifle.

Crookleg took the hint.

"I's swear, massa, I do dis t'ing right. Dis ole nigga don't want no bullet through him karkiss. I's swear I do as you say."

With this asseveration, he rose erect and entered boldly among the bushes, while Nelatee concealed himself behind them.

Warren started to his feet, calling out:

"Who's there?"

"Hush, Massa Warren! It's only me, ole Crookleg."

"Come in, Crookleg."

"No, Massa Warren, you come out here. I's want to speak to you 'thout disturbin' de young gal. I's want to show you somethin'."

With a hasty glance at the slumbering maiden, Warren Rody emerged from the cave.

At the entrance he was suddenly confronted by Nelatee.

"Nelatee!"

A yell of fiendish laughter from Crookleg answered the exclamation.

"He! he! he! Ho! ho! ho! Oh, dat am de best t'ing dis ole nigga ever done. Ah, de time am comin' now. Ho! ho! Massa Warren, who kicked de ole dog of a nigga, w'at fetch an' carry for de white man to de Injin gal? Ha! ha! ha! I 'clare to mercy it am splendid! Now I'll leave you two friends togedder. But don't quarrel—please don't! Only remember, Massa Warren—remember Crookleg to your dyin' day!"

With these words the negro darted off, and was soon lost to sight behind the bushes.

Warren stood gritting his teeth in impotent rage. He saw that he had fallen into a trap laid for him by Crookleg.

Nelatee stirred not an inch.

Again young Rody pronounced his name.

"Nelatee!"

"Yes, Nelatee! the brother of Sansuta—of your victim! Does not the sight of me turn you into stone? Is your heart so hardened that you do not tremble?"

Warren gave a short, mocking laugh.

"Go away from here," he said; "I owe no account of my actions to any one."

"Yes, you owe an account of them to that Great Spirit who is alike your God and mine."

"Pah! Stand aside, I say!"

"My arm will brain you if you move a step. Nelatee is a chief, and must be heard!"

"Well, then, go on."

"You once said you were my friend. Nelatee tears your friendship from his heart, and casts it to the wind. You are an assassin—a thief! You killed my father—you have stolen my sister. What answer do you make?"

"I make none."

"You are right; nothing can be said to palliate the crime of falsehood, murder and robbery. Come with me!"

"Indeed! Where to?"

"To our chief—to Wacora!"

"A prisoner?"

"Yes."

"And who is to take me?"

"I will."

"You!" retorted Rody, with a sneer.

"Yes; your life was in my hands but a minute ago. You live only because I would not kill you in my sister's presence. Your very slave has proved false to you. You are in my power. Wacora shall pass sentence on you, and that sentence will be death."

With a bound Warren rushed at Nelatee, who, suddenly dropping his rifle, grappled with him.

A terrible struggle ensued.

The young men were about equally matched in size and strength, while each knew that it was a contest for life or death.

Warren, by his unexpected onset, had at first some advantage over his antagonist, but the Indian speedily recovered it by his great power of endurance.

All feeling of pity had vanished from his breast. His sister's seducer was in his grasp. He had intended to take him prisoner; he would now kill him.

He made several unsuccessful efforts to draw his tomahawk, while Warren, inspired by the certainty that death would be the result, strove his utmost to prevent him from wielding the weapon.

Long did they continue the struggle without either speaking a word. Their heavy breathing, as they rolled over and over on the grass, was the only audible sound.

Nelatee at length succeeded in getting his antagonist under him, and with one arm he strove to hold him, while with the other he grasped for his tomahawk.

At this moment Warren made a superhuman effort, threw the Indian off, and with the speed of lightning snatched his rifle from the ground.

Nelatee had stumbled as he was thrown off, and lay sprawling on the earth.

Another instant, and he would have had a bullet through his body.

Was it an echo that answered the cocking of the rifle held in Rody's hand?

That was the last thought that crossed the seducer's mind.

The next moment he was a corpse.

A bullet had pierced his brain. It came from Wacora's gun, who had arrived upon the ground at the moment of Nelatee's fall.

Before either of the two Indians could speak a word, a piercing cry echoed upon their ears, a girl came gliding through the bushes and flung herself prostrate over the dead body!

It was Sansuta!

The air was filled with her lamentation as she kissed the cold forehead of her betrayer, and with a thousand endearing terms endeavored to recall him to life!

Nelatee approached and gently raised her from the ground. He was about to address her, but he started back in horror.

Her wild, staring eyes, with the unmeaning smile upon her lips, told the sad tale. Her reason had departed!

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE STRUGGLE IN THE STOCKADE.

ON that same night, the Indians, led by Wacora, stormed the stockade upon the hill.

The combat proved long and desperate, but the place was at length taken.

Bravely as the settlers fought, they had a foe to deal with implacable and determined.

As fast as the red warriors fell in the attack, others took their places, and from out the darkness, legions seemed to rise to avenge the death of their fallen comrades.

The white women loaded the rifles, stood by their brothers and husbands, assisting them in their fearful strife. But valor availed not—the settlers were doomed!

Never had Elias Rody been seen to greater advantage. He seemed ubiquitous, cheering and inspiring the men around him. Many who had condemned him till then, gave him credit for his bravery. He appeared to bear a charmed life, and was seen wherever bullets whistled, unharmed and undaunted.

All his hopes on earth were centered in successfully maintaining himself, and that strong physical courage which he undoubtedly possessed, stimulated by his frightful responsibility made him for the moment heroic.

His daughter, the gentle Alice, showed herself equally brave. She took under her care the wounded; she, who at any other time would have fainted at the sight of blood, bound up the ghastly wounds, and stood on that dreadful night by more than one death-bed, calm and courageous, upheld by the sustaining idea of duty.

But, what availed courage and devotion against numbers?

The stockade was at length carried, and after it the house which was instantly given to the flames.

A horrible carnage ensued among those who, unable to fly, were left to the besiegers' fury.

The worst passions were displayed in their worst forms, and helplessness pleaded in vain to hearts steeled with revenge.

The moon's rays lighted up a fearful scene.

Corpses of Indians and settlers, with their wives and children, strewed the ground of the inclosure.

The glare of the burning house added to the horror of the sight.

Some few of the colonists fled across the country, pursued by their relentless foes.

Though a small number escaped with life, many perished in their flight.

With vengeful cries, the Indians sought for Elias Rody, but failed to find him.

Had he, too, escaped? It seemed so, for nowhere could his body be discovered among the slain.

His daughter had also disappeared.

But half of their revenge seemed accomplished, and Wacora felt that with Rody alive, his uncle's death was not yet avenged.

In vain did he send warrior after warrior in search of the missing man.

All returned with the same answer. The white chief was not to be found.

Enraged at being thus baffled in his revenge, Wacora called his straggling forces together, and returned with them to the Indian camp.

After their departure, there was profound stillness within the stockade, more awful from contrast with the roar of battle there so lately raging.

The dead were left to repose in peace.

For a time this stillness continued unbroken.

Then from afar sounds began to be heard, gradually drawing nearer and nearer.

It was the howling of the gaunt Florida wolves, as they scented a rich repast.

Ere long they could be seen skulking through the inclosure, and quarreling over the corpses. Upon the morrow, above them, with shadowy wings, the vultures would hover, waiting to come in for their share of the spoil.

The moon sunk in the sky, and drew a pall over the dreadful sight.

At intervals, a flickering tongue of flame, shooting up from the expiring embers of the burnt house, imparted a weird aspect to the scene, lighting it up only to display its ghastly horrors.

Where was Elias Rody?

He had proved deceitful to the last.

Wacora and his warriors had sought him everywhere, but had failed to find him.

For all that he was near.

In the last attack made by the red-men, he had been wounded, not severely, but sufficiently to make him feel faint and giddy. He knew that he could no longer hope for success, and determined if possible to save his own life while there was a chance.

Amid the smoke and confusion he found no difficulty in withdrawing from the combat. Remembering a species of cellar he had caused to be dug in the rear of the house, he staggered toward it, and reached it unobserved by any of the combatants.

He paused before entering. A thought of Alice arrested him. He thought of the hopelessness of saving her; and tottering forward, half blinded by his own blood, he descended the steps of the cellar, at the bottom of which he fell insensible upon the floor.

Of the yells of the victorious Indians; the glare of the burning mansion; the shrieks of the wounded and the agonizing wail of defenseless women and children as they committed their souls to Heaven, Elias Rody, though the cause of all, heard nothing.

Beneath his own burning house, miraculously sheltered by some huge timbers which had fallen over the excavation, he lay for a long time, insensible to thought as to feeling.

When at length he recovered consciousness and crawled forth from his concealment, the sun had risen, lighting up the ruined pile.

He shuddered at the sight.

He suffered a thousand deaths in the contemplation of the horrors his mad selfishness had caused.

Bitter remorse, stronger than his shattered physical frame could endure, gnawed at his heart. But it was selfish remorse for all that.

Here was vengeance for Oluski, had the chief only been alive to witness it!

Too weak to get away from the spot, Rody groaned in the bitterness of his spirit.

"Ten thousand times may I be accursed for all this. Fool, blind, infatuated fool that I have been. Every aspiration might have been gratified, every hope fulfilled, had not my impatience blinded me against caution. May the fiend of darkness overtake these red—"

How long this tirade of blasphemous repentance of his villainy might have lasted, it is impossible to say. It was stopped, however, by a physical pain; and with a faint voice he cried out: "Water! water!"

Blood there was in plenty around him, but not one drop of water.

Others had yelled for it through the long, dreadful night as agonizingly as he, but had been answered by the same solemn silence. They had died in their agony. Why should not he?

"Well, then, let death come. The full accumulation of mortal torment has fallen on myself—it can not be greater."

Wrong in this, as in everything else.

See! skulking along the brow of the hill, stooping over, and examining corpse after corpse with a demoniac joy upon his hideous features, appears something in human shape, and yet scarce a man!

Horror of horrors, he is robbing the dead.

Rody saw him not, for he had again fainted.

With a harsh voice, rivaling the vulture's croak, the skulker continued his hideous task.

"Ha! ha! ha!" chuckled he to himself. "There am nice pickin' after all for dis chile; bonf from de bodies ob de white man an' de red. Bress de chance what sot 'em ag'in' each oder. Oh! but dis ole nigga am glad! so glad! But whar am he—whar am he? If dis chile don't find him, why den his work ain't more dan half done."

Diligently did Crookleg, for it was he, continue his search, turning over dead bodies, snatching some bauble from their breasts, and soon to others, as if still unsatisfied.

For whom was he seeking?

As he proceeded in his work, a voice that came from among a heap of ruins, was heard feebly calling for "Water!" The negro started, sending forth a shout of triumph.

He had recognized it as the voice of Elias Rody, the man for whom he had been searching.

As the latter recovered consciousness, he saw a hideous face close to his own, that caused him to start up, at the same time uttering a cry of horror!

CHAPTER XXIX.

AN EXULTING FIEND.

"I HAS found you, ha! I?"

"Crookleg!"

"Yes, it am Crookleg!"

"A drop of water for the love of God, a drop of water!"

"If de whole place war a lake, dis chile wouldn't sprinkle your parched lips with a drop out ob it."

"What do you mean, Crookleg?"

"Ha! the time I been waitin' for ha' come at last! It hab been long, but it am come. Do you know whar your son Warren am?"

"Thank Heaven! away from this, and in safety!"

"Ha! ha! ha! Safe! Yes, he am safe enough, wid a big bullet through his brain!" Elias Rody with an effort raised himself into a sitting posture, and glared upon the speaker.

"Dead?"

"Yes, dead! and it war me dat bro't him to it! Ha! ha! ha!"

"Who are you? Has hell let loose its fiends to mock me?"

"Perhaps it have! Who am I? Don't you know me yet, Rody?—Massa Rody?"

"No, devil; I know you not! My son dead! Oh, God! what have I done to deserve all this?"

"What hab you done? What hab you not done? You hab done ebbery t'ing dat de black heart ob a white man can do, an' de day ob reck'nin' am come at last! So you don't know me, don't you?"

"Away, fiend, and let me die in peace!"

"In peace! No, you shall die as you hab made oders live—in pain! When you can't hear dis nigga's voice plainly, he'll hiss it in at your ear, so it may reach your infernal soul, in de last minutes ob your life!"

"Who—who are you?"

"I am Reuben, de son of Esther!"

"Esther?"

"Yes! Esther, your father's slave! You was de cause ob her death. Do you know me now?"

Rody groaned.

"Dey called me Crookleg, kase I was lame. Who made me lame?"

Still no answer.

"It war you dat put de ball in my leg for sport, wen you war a boy, an' I war de same. I have been close to you for years, but you didn't know me. I war too mean—too much below de notice of a proud gentleman like you. But I hab a good memory, and de oath I'd taken to be even with ye, am kept. My mother was a slave, but she was my mother for all dat, an' if I war a black man, I war still a human bein', although you and de likes of you didn't think so. Do you know me now?"

Rody uttered not a word.

"When I war forced to limp away from your father's plantation, I war but a boy, but de boy had de same hate for de cruel massa, dat de lame nigga hab now for Elias Rody. Days and years hab pass since den, but de hate has kep' hot as ever; and I's happy now when I knows dat de dyin' planter am at de mercy of de mean slave. Don't be skeer'd! I wouldn't lift dis hand to help you eider die or live. All I's a-goin' to do, is to sit hya an' watch ober you till you am cold and stiff. Ebbery flutter your wicked soul makes to get free from your ugly body, will be a joy to me!"

"Oh, devil!" exclaimed the wounded man, in the depth of his agony.

"Debbil! yes, I is a debbil, and you has made me one!"

The negro, as he said this, knelt down by Rody's side, and thrust his face close up to that of the dying man, while a demoniac joy lit up his horrid features.

And he continued to gaze upon his victim until the gray shadow of dissolution stole over his countenance, the senses wandered, and the once bright eyes were becoming dimmed with the film of death.

A last scream burst from the lips of the dying man, followed by some words in piteous appeal.

"Ha! Help! Water! Water! My soul's on fire! D-vils! Demons! Away—away! Let me go! Unloose your burning hands from my heart—unloose! Ah! Horror!"

The cries ceased. Elias Rody was dead.

Remorselessly did the negro glare upon his expiring enemy, as he uttered these last frantic speeches, and when the spirit had passed away, he bounded to his feet and began to exult over his now unconscious victim.

At this moment another personage appeared upon the scene.

At some little distance from the spot, a man leaning upon his rifle had stood, taking a survey of the smoking ruins.

He had been for some time ignorant that any living being but himself was upon the hill.

His attention was now called to Crookleg, who, assured of his enemy's death, could no longer restrain his savage joy, but was giving vent to it in cries and fantastic caperings.

"Ho! bo! Dead! It am splendid sport to de ole nigga! Only to tink dat dis poor ole lame darky hab been de cause ob a war 'tween de whites an' de red-skins! Ha! ha! ha! It am 'most too good to be believed! But it am true! it am true!"

As the monstrous creature concluded the speech, he was seen to spring suddenly into the air, and then fall flat upon his face, a corpse.

A long hunting-knife had penetrated his back.

"There, durn ye, ye black hound! If you have been the cause of one war, you'll never have a hand in another. I swore not to fight ag'in' my own blood, nor to take part ag'in' the red-skins, but black blood don't count in my bargain!"

Saying this Cris Carrol drew his knife from the negro's body, and coolly sauntered away from the spot.

CHAPTER XXX.

ROBBED OF HIS REVENGE.

WACORA, after reaching the camp, dismissed his warriors and entered his tent alone.

The remainder of that night he passed in meditation.

Was it the influence of the white blood flowing in his veins that made him think of the slaughter he had directed and taken part in?

Strange inconsistency of Nature.

The heroic chief, still decked in the war-paint of his father's race, as he reviewed the events of the past few hours, could not restrain himself from shuddering.

His mother's spirit seemed to hover around him—her eyes sad and reproachful—her heart heavy.

"They were the people of my race, and so of yours, that you have immolated on the shrine of your vengeance."

So seemed it to say!

His head sunk upon his breast. He sighed heavily.

Long he continued in his gloomy abstraction, his thoughts deeper than plummet ever sounded.

The weary hours of night crept slowly past; and yet he stirred not. Fears and forebodings filled his warrior's heart.

"I have done all for the best," muttered he to himself. "Witness it thou, Great Spirit, all for the best! For the future of my father's race, I have closed my heart to pity. It was not for present vengeance alone that I urged on our people to the slaughter. It was that they might begin the great work of regeneration assured in their strength, conscious of their invincibility."

Like all high-strung natures, Wacora was subject to fits of despondency. With want of action this had come upon him. The excitement over, gloomy doubt had succeeded to bright hope.

The sun was high in the heavens ere he could bestir himself and shake off such thoughts. He at length made the effort, and emerged from his tent to consult with the warriors of his tribe.

As he stepped forth he perceived Marocota slowly approaching.

In an instant the slumbering passion of hate was reawakened; he saw in the young Indian's eye that he had news to communicate.

"Speak! have you found him?"

"Yes! He is found."

"I mean Warren Rody. Make no error, Marocota—tell me is it Warren Rody you have found?"

"He has been found!"

"Then all is well. Quick, bring him to me—let me look upon this dog of a pale-face!"

Marocota made no answer, but stood silent.

"Do you hear me? Bring the dog before me. My eyes hunger for a sight of his craven countenance. I would see his white-livered face of fear—watch his trembling frame as he stands in my presence."

Still Marocota did not speak.

"By the Great Spirit, Marocota, why do you not go for him? Why do you not answer me?"

"Marocota dreads your anger."

"You, an Indian warrior, and afraid! What do you mean?"

"That I have disobeyed your commands."

"Ha, wretch, I understand. You found him, but he escaped."

"Not that—"

"What is it, then? Speak. Did he defy you? Was he too powerful? Then summon our warriors, and if it cost the life of every Indian in Florida, I swear he shall be captured. Answer me, or I shall do you mischief."

"Marocota deserves punishment."

The young chief, now fully aroused to anger, cast a significant look at his subordinate. He could scarce refrain from striking him to the ground, and it was with an effort that he resumed speech.

"No more mystery! Speak! Where is he?"

"Dead!"

Wacora made a bound toward the speaker as he cried:

"Did you kill him?"

"I did!"

Marocota fearlessly stood to await the stroke of the upraised tomahawk.

It fell, but not on the Indian's skull.

With a curse, Wacora flung his weapon on the grass.

"Wretch!" he cried, "you have robbed me of my revenge. May the arm that took that man's life hang palsied by your side forever. May— Oh, curse you! curse you!"

Marocota's head fell upon his breast. He dared not meet his chief's angry glances, more dreaded than the blow of his hatchet.

For some moments there was silence, while Wacora paced to and fro like a tiger in its cage.

CHAPTER XXXI.

A SAD SPECTACLE.

AFTER a time the enraged chief, pausing in his steps, stood by the side of the silent warrior.

"Tell me how it happened," he said, apparently becoming calmer. "Tell me all!"

Marocota related the circumstances as they happened.

"It was to save Nelatee's life that you fired upon the monster?"

"It was!"

"And he? Where is Nelatee?"

"He is close by with Sansuta. See, they come this way!"

As Wacora looked in the direction indicated, he perceived his two cousins approaching.

At the sight a deep groan escaped from his bosom.

The beautiful maiden, now wan and sad, with her head leaning on Nelatee's shoulder, seemed absorbed in the contemplation of some wild-flowers which she held in her hand. There were others wreathed in her hair.

It was the only way that her brother had been able to entice her away from the spot where her seducer had perished. He had humored her as best he could, stopping every now and then, to allow her to pluck the flowers upon their path.

In this manner had she been conducted to the camp.

On coming up to Wacora, Nelatee held out his hand to his cousin, and the two, with tears in their eyes, exchanged a distracted grasp of the hand.

As for Sansuta, she did not look up from her bouquet, but with restless fingers continued arranging and rearranging the flowers, all the while singing to herself a sad, soft Indian air.

"Nelatee," said Wacora, "this is a sad sight!"

"Hush! she is quiet now! Twice this morning she has had passionate fits of weeping. See, she is unconscious of our presence. Has Marocota told you?"

"He has told me all! I would (ten thousand times more, now that I have seen her) have gladly given my own life to have taken his!"

"It was fat-d otherwise!"

"It was! But what is to be done with her? She must not stay here. We are now on the war-path. She must go along with the other squaws to our town."

"Then let me take her there—with me she is quiet. I will not be long away from you. I pant for action."

"Be it so!"

Nelatee turned to his sister, put his arm in hers, and was about to lead her off, when a man rushed into the presence of the chief, crying out as he approached:

"Good news! The body of the white chief, Rody, has been found, and—"

The warning gesture had been lost upon the impatient speaker.

It was too late now. Sansuta had heard the fated name.

Casting from her the flowers she had been trifling with, she uttered shriek upon shriek, running wildly and beseechingly backward and forward from her brother to her cousin, who both stood spellbound with surprise and grief.

"Where have you hid him? Give him to me. You shall not kill him. No, no, no. I say you shall not hurt him! Warren! Warren! 'tis Sansuta calls. Murderers! would you kill my love? He never injured you. Take my life, not his! Warren! Warren! Oh, do not keep him from me. See, that is his blood upon your hands. His eyes are closed in death! It is you, wretches, that have murdered him. No, no—stand back. I would not have you touch me while your hands are red with his blood. Back! back! I will find him. No, you shall kill me first. I will find Warren Rody! Help! help! Save me from his murderers! Help me to find my murdered lover!"

With renewed screams of agony that struck horror into the listeners' hearts, the girl eluding their grasp, darted away into the forest.

At a signal from Wacora, Nelatee started in pursuit.

"May the lightnings blast all who have brought about this. Fool that I was, just now, to feel pity for the pale-faces. Nothing that revenge can accomplish will make up for this! Here I swear to take vengeance, far more terrible vengeance, to which that of last night shall be but a mockery!"

With these words, the young chief hastened away from the spot, followed by Marocota and the messenger.

CHAPTER XXXII.

SPARE HER! SPARE HER!

THE opportunity of this vengeance was already close at hand.

Within the space inclosed by the Indian tents, under guard of some warriors, stood a group of pale-face prisoners.

It consisted of several men, and among them a young girl.

Wacora stopped on perceiving the group. His features were illumined with a savage joy.

One of the chiefs, advancing, reported their having been captured while attempting to escape through the adjoining forest.

"What's to be done with them?" he asked.

"They shall die by torture!"

"The girl?"

"She, too, shall die! Who is she?"

"I do not know."

Turning to Marocota, he propounded a similar question.

Marocota was equally ignorant of the person of the captive.

The chief ordered her to be brought before him.

With an undaunted step, although suffering from debility and sorrow, the girl allowed herself to be led along.

Once in Wacora's presence, with a modest courage she gazed into his face.

"Who are you?" he asked.

"Your prisoner!"

"When were you captured?"

"About two hours ago!"

"You were trying to escape?"

"I was!"

"Your companions, who are they?"

"I know nothing of them except that they are people belonging to the settlement. They were kind to me, and endeavored to help me in my escape."

"You know your doom?"

She answered, sadly:

"I expect no mercy."

Wacora, struck with this reply, felt an interest in the courageous girl which he could not account for.

"You have been taught to think of the red-man as a remorseless savage?"

"Not as remorseless, only as revengeful."

"Then you acknowledge that we have just cause for revengeful feelings?"

"I did not say so."

"But you implied it."

"All men have enemies; the truly great are the only ones who can forego revenge."

"But savages must act according to their instincts."

"Savages, yes! but men who know right from wrong should act from judgment."

"If I spared your life, you would still consider me a savage."

"My life is nothing to me. Those I loved are now dead."

"Your mother?"

"She died when I was a child."

"Your father?"

"Was killed last night."

Wacora seemed lost in thought as he said, half aside:

"So young, and yet with no fear of death."

The young girl overheard the muttered soliloquy, and made answer to it:

"To the unhappy, death is welcome."

"Unhappy?"

"I have told you that all I loved are dead."

"Yet, death is terrible."

With a mournful cadence in her voice, the young girl simply said:

"Is it?"

Wacora was astonished. His dauntless spirit felt for the captive. Another question rose to his mind. He gave it utterance.

"Your name?"

"Alice Rody."

With a yell of fiendish delight he grasped the maiden's arm.

"You! the daughter of that accursed man, the sister of that demon in human form! Then, by the Great Spirit above us, by the ashes of my ancestors, you shall die! My own hand shall inflict the blow!"

As he uttered these words, he drew a knife from his belt, and was on the point of sheathing it in her heart when his arm was seized, and a voice, full of agony, vibrated in his ear:

"Spare her! Ob, spare her! Take my life instead."

"Nelatee?"

"Yes, Nelatee, your cousin, your slave, if you will, only spare her life!"

"You forget her name!"

"No, no, I know it but too well."

"You forget that her father has been the accursed cause of all this misery."

"No, I remember that, too."

"That her brother was Sansuta's—"

"No, Wacora, I remember all!"

"Then you are insane thus to beg for her life. She must die!"

"I am not insane. Oh, Wacora, on my knees I implore you to spare her!"

"Rise, Nelatee; the son of Oluski should not bend his knee to man. At your intercession her life shall be spared."

Nelatee rose from the ground.

"You are indeed our chief, Wacora; your heart is open and generous."

"Stay yet, before you mistake me. I give you her life, but 'an eye for an eye' she shall suffer what Sansuta has suffered. I spare her life but not her honor!"

"Wacora!"

"I have said it. Here," turning to the assembled warriors, who had been amazed witnesses of the scene, "this is the child of our enemy, Elias Rody. I have, at Nelatee's entreaty, spared her life. I bestow her upon the tribe—do with her what you will."

Nelatee leaped before the advancing braves.

"Back!" he cried. "The first who lays hand upon her dies!"

Wacora gazed upon his cousin. In his breast, rage contended with wonder.

"Heed him not, he is insane!"

"No, not insane!"

"Speak: what then?"

"I love her—I love her!"

The young girl, who had stood like a statue throughout all the previous scene, gave a start, and cowering to the ground, buried her face in her hands.

To Wacora, the words of Nelatee were no less surprising.

Turning to the shrinking maiden, he said:

"You hear what Nelatee says. He loves you."

She murmured faintly:

"I hear."

"He loves you. Wacora, too, has loved. That love has been trampled upon, and by your wretch of a brother! Yet, still it shall plead for Nelatee. His request is granted. You are spared both life and honor, but must remain a prisoner. Conduct her hence!"

"And these men?" asked a warrior, pointing to the other prisoners.

Wacora's heart, touched for an instant by his cousin's pleading, as well as by Alice Rody's heroic bearing, became again hardened. He replied:

"They must die! not by the torture, but at once. Let them be shot!"

The brave fellows, disdaining to sue for mercy, were led away from the spot.

Nelatee approached the girl, and offered her his hand, intending to take her away. Shudderingly she drew back, and, with a calm grief, went forward alone.

Wacora, left to himself, fell again into a fit of abstraction, and paced back and forward, in front of his tent.

Soon after he heard several shots, that came echoing from the woods.

His captives had been released from all earthly care.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

RUIN AMONG THE RUINS.

THE Indian encampment near Tampa bay was broken up.

The women and children, attended by a few warriors, had departed for the town.

Alice Rody, a prisoner, went along with them.

Wacora, Nelatee, and the rest of the tribe, joined others of their race in the war which now rapidly spread over the whole peninsula.

For a time, the Seminole tribes led a wandering life. The varying successes or defeats of the protracted contest entailed upon them both vigilance and activity.

It was therefore only occasionally that the cousins were enabled to visit the town in which their people permanently resided.

Sansuta had now seldom any relapses of her fits of violent madness. She was silent and melancholy, and wandered about, wrapt in her own bewildered thoughts.

Alice, although a prisoner, was suffered to come and go as it pleased her. The poor girl had, with the loss of her father and brother, no aspiration for liberty. A dull apathy, which she did not endeavor to dispel, had come over her.

She spoke to no one but Sansuta, and the crazed victim of her brother's heartless selfishness was the only object which seemed to interest her.

Nelatee's love for the pale-face maiden made no progress.

A wan smile was all the reward the Indian youth received for his patient devotion.

In those intervals of the war which permitted him a residence in the Indian town, he became her very slave, and sought by a thousand attentions to win her regard.

To this end, vainly, he tried every means.

Vainly he rose at earliest dawn and made his way to the woods in order to secure for her the beautiful plumage of birds, or to gather rare flowers with which to gratify her.

When he presented such things, she thanked him without emotion, and surveyed them without pleasure.

She remained equally indifferent to his assiduous cares for her comfort, and seemed to ignore alike his presence and his passion.

Not that he ever breathed a word of it in her ears.

That confession had been wrung from him in his desire to save her life—it had never since found voice.

He felt that his passion was hopeless, but still he nursed it.

To Sansuta, Alice indeed proved a guardian angel.

At first, the Indian girl repelled the tender solicitude expressed by the white maiden, and with an alarmed look seemed to dread even her voice.

In time, however, won by the magic of kindness, she sought the company of the captive, and in her presence seemed happy.

Often they would stroll away from the town, and in some quiet spot pass hours together, Alice in silent thought, Sansuta in such childish employments as stringing beads or making baskets with the flowers and tendrils of the wild vine.

A favorite haunt with them was the old fort.

Among its ruins they would seat themselves in silence, each busy with her own thoughts.

And thus was their time tranquilly passed, while war was raging around them.

But the first storm of conflict had been passed, and was succeeded by a temporary calm.

The pale-faces had abandoned the smaller settlements and detached plantations, and in the neighboring towns awaited the arrival of the Government troops on their way to prosecute the campaign throughout the whole peninsula.

The Indians had sought their respective rendezvous, there to mature plans for a more perfect organization.

Nelatee and Wacora had returned home—for such was the title Wacora now gave to the place where Oluski's tribe had their permanent residence.

The exigencies of the contest had compelled the withdrawal of his own warriors from his father's town, and the two tribes, Oluski's and his own, had become fused into one powerful community.

The chief's feeling toward his captive had undergone a marked change. He no longer wished to harm her, and, had she demanded her liberty, he would have granted it freely.

Of what use is liberty to the homeless?

The prisoner's aspiration ever turns to home; that once destroyed, all places else seem the same.

Like those poor wretches mentioned in history, whose incarceration outlived the memory of the past, and whose friends and relatives were engulfed in the sea of forgetfulness, Alice Rody had become careless of her freedom, nay, in a manner, preferred her captivity to the uncertainties of an unknown future, where no kindred waited her return, no friends stood expectant to receive her!

Hope, the brightest possession to the wretched, was no longer hers.

A sense of security, almost contentment, had stolen into her heart. Time had done much to assuage the terrible sorrow from which she had suffered.

It was a wonderful transformation to the once high spirited girl who had shown such energy and fortitude in the midst of danger.

So thought the young chief, Wacora.

To Nelatee it was a negative happiness. She had not energy to chide his ardent devotion, but submitted to it passively, without bestowing the slightest encouragement.

One lovely afternoon, Sansuta, conducted by Alice, strolled to the ruined fort.

Arrived there, Sansuta proceeded to embroider a pouch she had commenced to make. Alice, seated on a fragment of stone, watched her companion's trivial employment.

As the Indian girl nestled close to the pale-faced maiden, she seemed on the point of fainting. She had grown thinner during the last few weeks, and her hollow cheeks were tinged with a hectic flush.

"Rest your head on my lap, Sansuta."

As Alice spoke, she gently caught the poor girl in her arms.

"I am tired—oh, so tired!" said Sansuta.

"You must not walk so far another time."

We must seek some place near to the town."

The Indian girl did not appear to heed her, but commenced singing softly to herself.

She paused abruptly in her song, and looked up into her companion's face.

"Last night I dreamed I was in another land, walking along a wood-path. It was strewn with lovely flowers; on both sides were beautiful creeping plants, over which bright butterflies sailed; there were birds, too—such birds!—with plumage of silver and gold. I heard music. Was it the land of the Great Spirit? Do you think it was?"

"Who knows? It might have been."

"There I met my father. Not stern as our warriors are—but sad and weeping. Why did he weep?"

Alice was silent. Her own tears hindered her from making answer to the artless question.

"When I saw him weeping, I, too, wept, and kissed him. He spoke kindly to me—but why did he weep?"

Still no answer from her listening companion.

"Then I dreamed—no, I cannot remember what else I dreamed—yet there was some one else there. I seemed to know his face, too—but a great storm arose, and all became dark, and I grew frightened. What was that?"

"Alas! Sansuta, I cannot read my own dreams, far less yours."

But Sansuta had already forgotten her questions, and was again singing softly to herself.

Presently she stopped once more, and putting both arms around Alice's neck, murmured that she was tired.

The pale-faced maiden kissed her, and as she did so, the tears from her eyes fell on Sansuta's cheek.

"Why do you weep? Who has injured you?"

Had Alice framed thoughts into words, she would have answered "the whole world"; but instead of this she only replied to her companion with gentle endearments, and at length caressed her into a gentle sleep.

It was a beautiful tableau for a painter to delineate—beautiful, but at the same time sadly impressive.

A young Indian chief, who had been a silent witness to it, must have thought so, by the sigh that escaped him, as he turned his face away.

Wacora was the chief who thus sighed.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

STRANGE CHANGES.

WACORA'S love for Sansuta had long since changed into pity.

A new feeling now possessed his heart.

A new love had arisen from the ashes of the past. Alice Rody was its object!

He had at first been struck with admiration at her courage; afterward, he had witnessed her discretion and tenderness, and then noted her beauty.

His thoughts, thus stirred, soon ripened into a passion far stronger than respect.

Pity and love had exchanged places within his bosom.

He and his captive had done the same.

The girl was free—her jailer had become her prisoner.

This new phase of feeling was not accomplished suddenly. It grew silently and slowly, but surely. One thought troubled Wacora. It was Nelatee's admiration for Alice Rody.

He saw that she cared not for his cousin; but he forbore to urge his own suit, out of compassion for Sansuta's brother. His love, therefore, was speechless, and his captive was unconscious of it.

But what of her?

She, too, had changed.

By one of those marvelous transformations of which the human heart is capable, Alice Rody not only became reconciled to her residence among the Indians, but soon found much that interested her, even to the awakening of pleasant thoughts.

Many of the Seminoles were, as has been stated, well educated, and with education had come the usual chastening influence.

This was especially true of the young chief, Wacora, and she had not failed to observe it.

The first reflection was: what he might have been had he been brought up among her own race—for, although she had not been told of his mother being a white woman, she did not doubt that he had white blood in his veins.

What might not a man of his intelligence, chivalric courage, and purity of thought, have become in a society where civilization would have developed all these mental qualities?

The question was a natural one when viewing only the advantages which high culture presented; but its obverse was unfavorable when considering that civilization is often an approach to barbarism through selfishness and rapacity.

She answered the query herself, and favorably for him.

This mental questioning once commenced, did not pause, but went on to further consideration of the character of the young chief.

His thoughtfulness seemed as much sprung from regret at the compulsory warfare he was waging against her race, as the noble enthusiasm with which his soul was filled.

The heart of woman easily yields its admiration to an enthusiast!

The motive may be condemned, but the spiritual essence of thought that prompts to action still remains to be admired.

It will thus be seen that the first abhorrence had given place to interest, and interest had ripened into—

Into what!

There was no answer to that question, as it came before Alice Rody's mind. She evaded it, and strove calmly to consider Wacora as her captor.

But it soon seemed impossible to look upon him in this light.

No preux chevalier could be more courteous in his bearing; no prince more calmly conscious of his own birthright.

His was of the oldest patent. Whether thinking so or not, he was one of Nature's noble-men.

A few months had wrought these marvelous changes in the personages of our tale, and upon Wacora's sudden departure to the scene of war, both he and his captive felt a strange void in their hearts, unaccountable because novel.

Nelatee, whose hope of winning the regard of the pale-faced maiden had sunk into a calm state of despair, departed with his cousin, hoping that on the field of battle he might find a still calmer rest.

His fate, wrapped in the dark mystery of the future, was veiled from him.

CHAPTER XXXV.

A PEACEFUL PARTING.

THE summer had waned into autumn.

With the change of season came also a change over the hapless Indian maiden, Sansuta.

Her weakness, which had been continually increasing, was now so great that she could no longer stray with Alice to their favorite haunts.

The poor girl's form had wasted away, and her features become shrunken. Her dark, lustrous eyes alone seemed to retain their vitality.

All her former violence had disappeared, and a change had also made itself manifest in her mental condition.

Now and then she had lucid moments of thought, during which she would shed torrents of tears on Alice's shoulder—only with the return of her malady would she appear happy and at peace.

Toward sunset of a lovely day the two girls sat together at the door of Sansuta's dwelling.

"See," said the Indian girl, "the flowers are closing, the birds have gone into the deep forest. I have been expecting some one, but he has not come yet. Do you know who it is?"

"No, I do not."

"Tis Warren. Why do you start and tremble? He will not hurt you. Who was it you thought I meant?"

"I cannot tell, dear Sansuta."

"No one but him. I think of him always, although—" she added, lowering her voice to a whisper, "I dare not call his name. I'm afraid to do that. I'm afraid of my brother Nelatee, and my cousin Wacora. Why does the sun look so fiery? It is the color of blood—blood—blood! That red color, is it on your hands, too? Ah, no! you are no murderer!"

"Hush, Sansuta; you are excited!"

"Oh, yonder sun! Do you know that I feel as if it were the last time I shall ever see it set! See, there are dark lines across the sky, ribbed with bands of black clouds. It is the last day, the last day!"

"I see nothing, only the approach of night."

"But you hear something. Don't you hear the spirits singing their death march over Oluski's grave? He was my father. I hear it. It is a summons. It is for me. I must go."

"Where?"

"Far away. No, it is of no use clasping me to your heart. It is not Sansuta's body that will leave you—it is her spirit. In the happy hunting-grounds I shall meet with him."

A few moments after she became tranquil; but the lucid interval succeeded, and hot tears coursed down her hollow cheeks.

Again her mind wandered, and for two or three hours, refusing to enter the house, she sat muttering to herself the same fancies.

Alice could but sit beside her and listen. Now and then she sought to soothe her, but in vain.

By-and-by, Sansuta's voice grew faint. She seemed to lean heavier on the arm of her pale-faced friend, and the luster of her eye gradually became dimmer.

The change was alarming, and Alice would have risen and called for help, but an imploring glance from Sansuta prevented her.

"Don't leave me!" she murmured, gently.

Her voice was charged. She had recovered reason, and her companion perceived it.

"Do not leave me! I shall not detain you long. I know you row—have known you, it seems, for years. You are Warren's sister. In his sister's arms let his Sansuta lie. All the terrible past returns to me. I know it all, but yet I do not grieve, for there is peace in my heart toward all, even to those who took his life. Forgiveness has come back with reason, and my last prayers shall be, that they who made Sansuta unhappy may be forgiven!"

She spoke in so low a voice, that it was with difficulty her companion could hear what she said.

"Kiss me, Alice Rody! Speak to me! Let me hear you say that Sansuta was your friend!"

"Was—is my friend?"

"No; let me say was, for I am about to leave you. The time is come. I am ready! My last prayer is 'Pity and Forgiveness!' Pity and—"

By the feeble motion of her lips, she appeared to be praying.

The motion ceased, and with it her unhappy life.

Alice still continued to hold her in her arms long after her soul had passed into eternity!

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE BURNT SHANTY.

THE ghost of Crockleg did not in any way disturb Cris Carrol, either sleeping or awake.

The worthy blackwoodsman believed that he had done a highly meritorious action, in forever disposing of that malevolent individual.

"The infernal black skunk, to be cuttin' his capers over the bodies of brave men, who had laid down their lives in a war he and sich as he brought about. It war no more nor an act of justice to send him to everlastin' perdition, and if I never done a more valuable thing to society than stickin' three irons of cold steel between his two shoulder-blades, I think I deserves the thanks o' the hull community."

This consolation Cris indulged in whenever he thought of that terrible episode upon Tampa hill.

He had returned a few days after the massacre, and had found the dead decently buried.

Wacora had commanded it to be done.

The charred ruins of Rody's house, however, recalled the memory of that eventful night.

For some time after his last visit to Tampa bay, Cris Carrol had not been seen. Neither the pale-faces nor the red-skins had been able to discover his whereabouts.

The truth is, that the backwoodsman was glad to get away from scenes where so much violence had been done to his feelings.

As he had said, he couldn't fight against the Indians, and he wouldn't take up arms against the whites.

"It ain't in human natur' to shoot and stab one's own sort, even when they're in the wrong, unless they'd done somethin' ag'in' one's self, and that they hain't, so far as regards me. I'll be eternally dog-goned if I think the red-skins are to blame, for risin' ag'in' oppression and tyranny; which is what old Rody did to them, to say nothin' ag'in' him now he's dead, but to speak the truth, and that's bad enough for him. No; they war not to blame for what they did arter his conduct to them, the old cuss, who, bad as he war, had one redeemin' feature in his karaktur, and that war his angeliferous darter. Where kin she have gone a-bidin'? That puzzles this chile, it do."

Cris was unaware of Alice's capture and imprisonment.

As suddenly as he had taken departure from Tampa, Cris returned to the same neighborhood. He expected the war to be transferred to a more distant point, and wished, still, to keep out of the way.

"It's the darnedest kind of fightin' I ever heard on," said he to himself. "First it's here, then it's there, and then it ain't nowhere till it breaks out all over ag'in where it was before, and they're as far off the end of it as I am from Greenland. Durn it, I never knowed nothin' like it."

On his return to Tampa he found the country around altogether deserted. Most of the buildings and planters' houses had been destroyed. Even his own wretched hut had been burned to the ground.

"This is what they call the fortun' of war, I s'pose," he remarked as he stood gazing at the ruins. "Wal, it war a ramshackle crazy ole shanty, anyhow, and I allers despised four walls and a roof at the best o' times. Still, it war 'home.' Pshaw!" he added, after a moment's silence, "what have I to grow mollencholly about, over sich a place as this, calling it 'home,' when I still have the savannas to hunt over an' sleep upon. If thar's sich a place as home for me, that's it and no other."

For all his stoicism, the old hunter sighed as he turned from the blackened spot which marked the site of his former dwelling.

He paused at the bend of the road, where Crookleg had first met Nelatee, to gaze again at his ruined home. Not only paused, but sat down on the self same rail that the negro had perched upon, and from gazing upon it, fell to reflecting.

So absorbed was he in its contemplation that, contrary to his usual caution, he took no note of time, nor once removed his eyes from the subject of his thoughts.

He did not perceive the approach of a danger.

It came in the form of four individuals, who had silently and stealthily crept close to the spot where he was sitting. Before he knew of their proximity, he was their prisoner.

"Red-skins!" he exclaimed, struggling to free himself.

His captors smiled grimly at his vain efforts.

"By the eternal! I'm treaded this time! Durn my stupid carcass for not havin' eyes sot in the back o' the head. Wal, you may grin, old copper-skins; it's your turn now—maybe it'll be mine next. What are you a-doin' now?"

Without deigning a reply, the Indians bound his arms securely behind him.

That done, they made signs to him to follow them.

"Wal, gentlemen," said Cris, "y'u'r' about as silent a party as a man might wish to meet, durn me if you ain't! I'm comin'. Much obleeged to you for your escort, which I ked 'a' done without. So, thanks to your red-skin perliteness for nothin'! Go ahead, I kin walk without your helpin' me. Where air ye bound for?"

"To the chief," answered one of the men.

"The chief—what chief?"

"Wacora."

Cris uttered an emphatic oath.

"Wacora! eh? If that's the case, I reckon the days o' Cris Carrol air drawing to a close. The fiercest and most vengeful cuss of them all, I've heard say. Lead on. I'll go along with ye willin', but not cheerful. If they kill me like a man, I'll not tremble in a jint; but if it's the torture—there, go ahead! Don't keep the party waitin'!"

Brave heart, as he was, he followed them with as bold and free a step, to what he believed to be his death, as if alone, and at liberty on the savanna.

The Indians, without exchanging a word, either among themselves or with him, proceeded toward Oluski's town.

At night they encamped in the forest.

Lighting no fires, lest these might betray them to their enemies, they produced from their packs some dried meat and meal-cake.

Cris did full justice to the humble fare, although he made rather a wry face at the gourd of spring water, with which he was invited by his captors to wash down the frugal repast.

Mastering his aversion, he, however, managed to swallow a few mouthfuls.

Supper over, two of his captors wrapped themselves in their blankets, and immediately fell asleep. The other two remained awake, watching him.

Carrol saw that any attempt to escape under the eyes of two Indians would be idle.

One he might have coped with, even unarmed as he was. Two would be more than a match for him, and he knew that on the slightest alarm the sleeping men would awake, making it four to one.

With the philosophy of a stoic he threw himself upon the ground, and also fell asleep.

He awoke once in the night to find that his guards had been changed. There was no better prospect of freedom than before.

"Durn them! they're bound to fix me, I kin see that plain enough. Besides, with these 'tarnal, all-fired thongs cuttin' into my elbows, what could I do?"

Apparently nothing, for, with a muttered curse at his own stupidity, he again composed himself to slumber.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

DEATH AT THE STAKE.

WITH the dawn of morning, Cris Carrol and his captors continued their journey.

They made no other halt before reaching the town.

Carrol, in vain, tried to draw from them the reason of their unexpected presence at so great a distance from the residence of the tribe.

They gave him no satisfaction.

He discovered, however, that, whatever errand they had been sent on, they had failed in accomplishing it, and his own capture began to be considered by him as a peace-offering with which they intended to mollify Wacora's wrath at their want of success in the mission with which they had been charged.

"Wal," reflected he, "I suppose I'm in some poor devil's place. Perhaps I mou't take more pleasure in doing him this good turn if I only knowed who he is. No doubt, he's got some folks as 'u'd grieve over him, but there ain't a many as will fret over Cris Carrol, not as I knows on. Yes, all right! go ahead! let's go whar glory 'waits us, ye catawampous scamps you. Ah, four to one; if it had been two to one, or, at a pinch, three to one, I'd have tried it on if it hed cost me all I've got, and that's my life. Wag! it's almost enough to make one turn store-keeper to think on't!"

Unmoved by the taunts and jeers which Cris liberally showered upon them during the journey, the Indians continued to watch him narrowly.

It was about mid-day when they arrived at their destination.

On entering the Indian town, Carrol was thrust into one of the houses, where he was left to await the order of Wacora as to his final disposition. Four guards were kept over him—two inside the house, the other two without.

He expected immediate death, but he was left undisturbed for the rest of the day, and at night received some supper, consisting of dried meat, bread and water. He was then permitted to pass the hours till morning as seemed best to him.

The hunter soon arranged his plans. He wrapped the blanket that had been given him around his body, and in a few moments was in a sound slumber.

His sleep lasted until a hand upon his shoulder, along with a summons to awake, aroused him. It was one of his guards of yesterday who addressed him:

"Come!"

"Is that you, old dummy?" asked he, recognizing the Indian. "I can't say I'm glad to see you, since you've broke in on the pleasantest dream I've had for a long time. But, never mind! bow shed you know you war a doing it, you poor, savage critter you, that don't know nothin' but to handle a tomahawk, and raise the ha'r off a human head. What do you want with me now?"

"The warriors are assembled!"

"Air they? Wal, that's kind of them, only they needn't have put themselves out of the way to get up so early on my account. I could have waited."

"Come!"

"Wal, I'm comin'; d'ye think I'm afraid, durn ye? D'ye think I'm afraid of you, or all the warriors of y'ur tribe, or y'ur chief, Wacora, either?"

"Wacora is not here!"

"Not here! Where is he?"

"I can not answer the pale-face's question. I come to bring you before the council."

"Wal, I'm ready to go afore the council."

As they were about to emerge from the house, a sudden idea seemed to strike Carrol, and he stopped his conductor.

"Say, friend, will you tell me one thing?"

"Speak."

"Whar air we?"

"At Oluski's town."

Carrol's face beamed with a sudden joy.

"And his son, Nelatee, is this his house?"

"It is."

"Huray! Now, I dare say you wonder at my bein' struck all of a heap wi' delight. But I'll tell you one thing, red-skin—no offense, not knowin' your name—you and y'ur three partners have tuk a most uncommon sight of trouble all for nothin'."

"What do you mean?"

"Jist this: Go and tell Nelatee that Cris Carrol is the party as you sneaked up to and took prisoner, and arter that, streak it for your precious lives."

"Nelatee?"

"Yes, Nelatee; he's a friend o' this ole coon, and one that'll prove himself so, too, in givin' you skunks as took me a deal more nor you bargained for."

"Nelatee is not here."

"Not here? Why, didn't you tell me jist now that this war his father's town?"

"I did, but Nelatee is not here."

"Not now, perhaps, but I s'pose he'll be here."

"He will not return for weeks."

Carrol's countenance fell.

"Then, dog-gone your skins, lead on! I throw up the deck of cards, now that the trump's out of them. 'Tis my luck, and it's the darnedest luck I ever see'd. There's no standin' ag'in' it. I s'pose I must gi'n in."

They entered the council-chamber, where the assembled warriors awaited them.

With his foot upon the threshold, his manner entirely changed from the light, jeering hilarity he had exhibited to that of a calm, dignified bearing.

He saw in an instant that he was foredoomed.

The stern expression of his judges told him as much.

The mock-ceremonial of examination was proceeded with, and a vain attempt made to extract from him intelligence of the movements of the whites, especially of the numbers and disposition of the Government troops, some of whom had by this time arrived on the peninsula.

His disdainful refusal to betray his own race did him no service.

True, he was already sentenced to die, but the manner of his death might, perhaps, inflict horror upon him who had no fear of dying.

Though the questions were skillfully put to him, the old hunter saw through them all.

He did not, indeed, possess much knowledge of the military invasion, but, had he been in the secrets of the commanding officer himself, he could not have been more reticent in his replies.

Utterly foiled in their questioning, the warriors played their last card, and, with threats of the most horrible tortures, endeavored to wring from his fears what his honor would not reveal.

Vain effort on their part.

Cris did indeed wince when they first spoke of torture; but, recovering himself, he became more proudly defiant than before.

"Ye may shake my old body with rackin' pains—I know you've got devil's inventions, and I don't deny but they're awful—but there's somethin' about me that ye can't make tremble, not if all the imps o' Hades were yer slaves. That's my soul. It'll come out o' y'ur fiery ordeal as calm as it is now, and with its last thoughts it'll despise and dare ye! Cris Carrol aren't bin backwoods hunter for a matter goin' on forty years to be skeart at burnin' sticks or hot lead, and he'll die as he has lived, an honest man!"

A mingled murmur of admiration and anger ran through the assembled crowd, and it was evident that many of the warriors would have given consent to his being set free.

There is something about true courage which extorts admiration even from an enemy.

A hurried consultation took place among the head men in council.

It was speedily over, and the oldest of their number rose, and pronounced sentence against the prisoner.

It was death by burning at the stake.

Cris Carrol was not surprised on hearing it!

The sentence had already lost half of its terror. He had made up his mind that this would be his doom.

Only one word of response came from his lips:

"When?"

"To-morrow!" replied he who had pronounced judgment.

Without bestowing a glance upon those who had thus fixed the limit of his earthly career, the hunter strode from the council-chamber with calm and measured steps.

As he passed out, the crowd made way for him, and many of the faces expressed admiration—some even pity.

The stoic bravery of the Indian is marvelous, and for him death has no terrors. With them it is a sort of fatalism.

What they do not dread themselves, they make but light of in others.

For all that, they have the highest admiration for a man who dares meet death calmly.

In their eyes the white captive had assumed all the importance of a great warrior.

Yet was he an enemy—one of the race with whom they were at war. Therefore he must lie.

Thus strangely do civilization and barbarism meet on common ground.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE SLEEPING DRAUGHT.

CRIS CARROL'S fortitude did not desert him, when he once more found himself alone in the prison.

He was not wholly unmoved by the reflection that on the morrow he must die. For it was a death such as even a brave man might not meet bravely; but a lingering death, by torture.

The hunter knew what this meant.

"A bullet ain't nothin'," said he to himself. "It's into yer body afore ye knows it, and if it's in yer vitals there's an end on it. But to stand up to be prodded with burnin' sticks, requires a philosophy a'most as much as this hyar child have got. Dog-rot it, it won't bear thinkin' on, that it won't! But I'll be all-fired eternally if them fellows shall know how it hurts Cris Carrol! So, let 'em do their worst, durn 'em!"

After this self-consoling soliloquy, he calmly went to work to make himself comfortable, by laying his blankets on the bare ground, and improvising a pillow out of some logs that lay within reach.

As he handled the billets, a strange desire seized him. It was to knock his guard's brains out, and make a dash for liberty; but a moment's reflection convinced him that the attempt at escape would be futile, the men outside being doubtless prepared to oppose his exit.

A disinclination to shed blood uselessly decided him; and he lay down composedly, after lighting his pipe.

For some time he ruminated on his condition, puffing curls of smoke into the air, and watching them as they disappeared.

Once or twice he heard a scratching noise near the corner of the room, but it ceased almost as soon as he had noticed it.

At length giving way to weariness, he composed himself to sleep, and before long his loud snoring suggested to his guards that they might relax their vigilance.

They accordingly retired outside the door, after having assured themselves that his slumber was genuine.

There were still four of them, and they began chattering to each other, for a time forgetting their prisoner.

He was at length awakened by a gentle tug at his arm, which had to be repeated several times before it had the effect of arousing him.

In an instant he sat up.

"Eh? What? By the eternal!"

An admonition of silence checked him, and he surveyed with an astonished countenance, the cause of his disturbance.

In the darkest corner of the hut, he perceived an opening through which the face of a young girl was visible. He started on recognizing her.

"Hush," said she, in a whisper, "remember you are watched. Lie down again. Listen, but say nothing. Ha! they are coming back!"

At these words the speaker withdrew. Just in time, as two of the guards next moment re-entered the room.

They did not stay long. The heavy snoring, which Cris improvised for them, disarmed them of suspicion.

The moment they were again gone, he turned his eyes toward the opening, and listened.

"Do you know me? Answer by a sign."

Cris nodded in the affirmative.

"You believe I am desirous to serve you?"

To this question he almost nodded his head off.

"Listen, then, and be careful to obey my instructions. This opening leads into the next house. The exit from it is through another. Unfortunately it is a public room. Therefore you cannot escape that way without running as much risk as you would in going directly out by the door. Don't go that way, but by the window. You see that window?"

Cris looked up. He had seen the window, certainly, and had already looked at it in every possible light while considering a means of escape, but had come to the conclusion that it wouldn't suit.

In reply, he shook his head despairingly.

His visitor seemed to understand him.

"It is too high, perhaps?"

Cris intimated by a sign that the difficulty was not in its height.

"The bars would prevent your getting out?"

The hunter's head nodded like a mandarin's.

"Is that all? Then I may as well tell you—hush! some one is coming."

One of the sentinels had thrust his head inside of the door. He quickly withdrew it, convinced that all was right.

On its disappearance, Carrol's mysterious visitor returned, and resumed the conversation.

"You think those bars would hinder your escape?"

Another nod was the answer.

"You are mistaken."

The backwoodsman, now perfectly au fait with his pantomimic part of the dialogue, gave a modest but expressive look of dissent.

"I tell you you are mistaken," continued the young girl; "they are all sawn through. I see you are curious to know who did that!"

"Cris said 'yes,' without speaking a word."

"It was I!"

"You?" he telegraphed.

"Yes, I was once a close prisoner in this very room; not watched as you are, but still a prisoner. I broke a watch to pieces, took out the main-spring, filed a saw with the nail-cleaning blade of a pen-knife, and with that I sawed away the bars, leaving barely enough to hold them together."

Carrol's look expressed astonishment.

"Yes, it was hard work, and it took weeks to accomplish it. I dare say you wonder why I didn't make my escape. That's too long a story to tell you now."

The backwoodsman's look was very eloquent, and his visitor quick of comprehension. By that look he asked a question.

"No, I'm not a prisoner now," she answered, "only in name. You shall have the benefit of my labor. But you must do everything cautiously. And first to get rid of your guards."

How was this to be done?

It was the captive who asked himself this question.

"Here is a bottle," continued she; "it contains a sleeping-draught. When they return, ask them for a drink. They will give it to you in a gourd. Manage to pour the contents of this bottle into the gourd, and invite them to drink along with you. They will do so, as they never refuse a condemned captive. In a few minutes the draught will take effect. Then climb to the window, remove the bars without noise, let yourself down softly, and make your way straight into the forest. No thanks, till I see you again!"

With these words his visitor vanished, the opening in the wall closed noiselessly, and Cris lay wondering whether he had been sleeping or waking, listening to a soft, delicate voice, or only dreaming that he heard it.

The vial in his hand, however, gave token that he had not been dreaming. His visitor was no creature of another world, but one of this mundane sphere.

The hunter scratched his head with bewilderment, and mentally reviewed the situation.

"Wal, of all the surprisingest things as ever I met, this air the most tremenjous. Bite me to death with gallinippers if ever I thought to have seed sich a thing, and not yell right out. And me a-lyin' here while that splendiferous critter war a-botherin' her brain to serve this old sinner. It's the most eternal 'stonishing thing over heard on—that's what it is. Wag! so you're come ag'in, are ye?" he continued, as two of his guards re-entered. "Wal, I reckon I've got somethin' as'll suit y'ur complaint. Come in, ye imps ye!"

The unconscious objects of his apostrophe having entered the room, seated themselves not far from him, chatting with each other. The subject of their conversation was uninteresting to their prisoner, who lay revolving in his mind what was best to be done.

The time for putting his plan into execution had at length arrived. His sentinels had ceased conversing, and were with difficulty keeping themselves awake.

"Look hyar, red-skins," he said, addressing them, "have ye sich a thing as a drop of water? I'm chokin' wi' thirst, and I see it's no use waitin' till you asks me, so I'll take trouble off your hands, and ask you."

One of the Indians good-naturedly went outside, returning with a gourd which he handed to the prisoner.

Cris raised it to his lips and drank; then paused, as if for breath.

"By the eternal," said he, "if I didn't think I seed one of your comrades put his head in that thar door. What kin he want?"

The men looked in the direction of the door.

The contents of the vial were poured into the gourd.

When the Indians looked again at their captive, he was apparently enjoying another long draught of water.

Not a drop, however, passed his lips.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, after his seemingly exhausting imbibition, and with the greatest difficulty suppressing a grimace, "there's nothin' like water to refresh one. It a'most gives a dyin' man a new lease o' his life. I wonder I never tried it afore. There's a smack of freedom about it that's worth it's weight in gold. Try it yourselves, and don't stand starin' as if you was a-coin' to swallow me."

The comical expression of their captive's face, more than the speech he had made, induced them to oblige him.

Putting their lips to the gourd, each took a draught of the water.

They did not seem to coincide with him in his opinion of its virtues.

The old hunter laughed in his sleeve on perceiving their wry faces.

"Don't like it, eh? Wal, ye don't know what's good for ye. Poor, benighted critters! how should ye?"

As he made the remark he fell back upon his log bolster, and again seemed to compose himself to sleep.

If the Indians had been somnolent before drinking the water, they were not rendered more wakeful by the indulgence, and it was almost ludicrous to see what useless efforts they made to battle against the potent narcotic.

In vain they talked to each other, got up and paced the room, and endeavored to stand up without leaning against the walls.

This struggle between sleep and watchfulness at length came to a close.

In less than ten minutes after taking the draught, both lay stretched along the floor in a deep, deathlike slumber.

The backwoodsman lost no time. With an agile motion he planted his feet in the interstices of the logs, and reached the window.

A slight wrenching of the bars showed the skill with which they had been sawn asunder.

One after another gave way, and the whole framework was in his hands.

He was on the point of dropping it gently, when outside under the window he saw a human form.

It was that of an Indian!

CHAPTER XXXIX.

AN OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

ON seeing the Indian, Cris Carrol felt himself in a dilemma.

But he did not pause long before taking action.

He saw that the man was not watching him, but seemed to have his eyes fixed upon the windows of the adjoining habitation.

Quietly pulling in the iron framework, which was beginning to feel heavy, Cris deposited it without noise in the interior of the room, and again clambered up to the window. Before doing so, however, he stole his knife from one of the sleeping sentinels.

The Indian outside had still maintained his attitude. When Cris looked forth again he saw him with his eyes fixed on the same spot.

What was to be done?

The only thing that suggested itself to the hunter, was precisely what he did.

He crept out through the window.

So quietly, that ere the individual below was aware of his presence, he had seized him by the throat and forced him to the ground.

A surprise awaited him when he had accomplished this feat. The Indian's face was revealed, and to Carrol's surprise, no less than his joy for not having plunged the knife into his heart, he recognized it.

"Nelateel!"

"Carrol!"

"Hush, or you'll alarm all the red-skins about the place!"

"What are you doing here?"

"I've just dropped out of that thar window."

He pointed to the opening above.

"How come you to go in there?"

"I didn't go in of my own will. You may bet high on that. I war brung."

"Who brought you?"

"Four o' your own Injins."

"A prisoner?"

"That's about the size of it. I shouldn't have been one much longer."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, that to-morrow I'd have been as dead as a man could be with forty or fifty fellows playin' blue blazes on his karkiss."

"Ha, they have decreed on burning you?"

"That's it, lad, and consarn me if I ain't glad to be out here in the open air a-tellin' it you, 'stead of in thar a thinking on it."

"Who condemned you?"

"Wal, thar names hev a kind o' slipped my memory, but they war warriors and braves of y'ur enlightened community."

"Why did you not send for me?"

"I thought of that, but they told me you war gone, and wouldn't be back in time for the ceremony."

"How did you get out here? Who opened the window?"

"That war done by a angel."

"An angel! What do you mean?"

"Just this: that at one of the corners of that thar eternal hole, a angel appeared and showed me the road to liberty."

"Who was it?"

"Wal, it air no use keepin' it from you—"

"Speak! Who was it?"

"I'll tell you; but first listen a spell to somethin' else. Nelateel, lad, I once did you a sarvice."

"You did. I sha'll never forget it."

"Durn it, it warn't for that I made mention on it. It was only this: Look me in the face, and tell me on the word of a man you mean square with me. Do that and I'll put my trust in ye, as I'm now puttin' my life in your hands."

"Upon an Indian warrior's word, I am your friend!"

"You air, Nelatee? Then dog-gorn me if I doubt you! Your hand!"

They exchanged a friendly grasp.

"It is more nor my life—it air the good name and actions of the most splendiferous, angeliferous critter the sun ever sot eyes on; it air—"

"Alice Rody?"

The hunter showed some surprise as Nelatee uttered the name.

"Yes, it war that same gal. But how on airth did you come for to guess it so straight?"

"Because that one name is never absent from my thoughts."

The hunter uttered a strange exclamation.

"Ho-ho!" he muttered to himself, "the wind sets in that quarter, do it? Poor lad! I'm afeard thar ain't no chance for him."

"I fear it," said Nelatee, overhearing the muttered remark. "But come; what she has commenced I will accomplish. At all risks, I shall assist you in regaining your liberty."

"Wal, I'll be glad to git it."

"Then follow me."

The Indian rapidly crossed the open space at the back of the house, and led the way to the edge of the forest. The released captive strode silently after.

They paused under a grove of live-oaks, in the shadow of which Carrol perceived a horse.

"It is yours," said Nelatee; "follow the straight path and you are free."

"Nelatee," said the backwoodsman, "you've done me a great service. I'm going to give you a bit of advice in return for it: Give up the angeliferous critter that's your prisoner, send her back to her own people, and forget her."

"If I could forget her, you mean?"

"Wal, I don't know much myself about them thar things, only my advice is, 'Give her up!' You'll be a deal happier," he added, suddenly waxing impassioned. "That 'ere gal air as much above eyther you or me, or the likes of us, as the genoine angels air above all mortals. Therefore give her up, lad—give her up!"

Again pressing Nelatee's hand in his, the old hunter climbed into the saddle, gave a kick to the horse, and rode off a free man.

"Kim up, you Seminole critter," said he to the animal he bestrode; "an' tote me once more to the open savannas, for durn me if this world ain't gittin' mixed up so that it's hard for a poor, ignorant feller like me to know whether them that call 'emselves civilized air more to be thought on than them that air savages, or wicey wersey."

The question was one that has puzzled clearer brains than those of Cris Carrol.

CHAPTER XL.

THE TALE OF AN INDIAN CHIEF.

AS the old hunter has ridden out of our sight, and forever, let us return to the Indian town, where Alice Rody was so strangely domiciled.

Her people had buried the ill-fated Sansuta near the old fort.

The wild-flowers she had loved so well had already blossomed over her grave.

Wacora and Nelatee had both been present—both much affected.

The events of the contest had called them away immediately afterward. Wacora remained absent, but his cousin had made a stolen visit to the town, as shown by the incidents already related.

The search for the escaped captive was carried on for some time with vigor, but was at length abandoned.

Meanwhile, the other captive's life passed without incident. The aid she had given the backwoodsman had afforded her the greatest pleasure. She had been informed of his capture immediately after his condemnation, and was resolved to help him in his escape. She did not know of Nelatee's presence near the scene, nor of his well-timed assistance.

The Indian youth had ridden many miles that evening, merely to stand and gaze at her window.

To feel that he was near her seemed a happiness to him.

He departed without even seeing her.

Weeks had elapsed since the Indian maiden had been laid to rest within the old fort.

Alice often visited the spot.

And there Wacora, who once more returned to the town, again saw her.

She was seated on the same stone, where Sansuta's head had rested on her bosom. On perceiving the chief's approach she rose to her feet, as if to quit the spot.

"Does my coming drive you away?" he asked.

"Not that; but it is growing late, and I must return to my prison."

"Your prison?"

"Is it not my prison?"

"It is no more your prison than you are a prisoner. You have long been free."

There was a mournful sadness in her speech, which touched the heart of the Indian chief.

"Freedom is a boon only to those who can enjoy it."

"And you are unhappy?"

"Can you ask that question—you who have done so much?" She paused; her generous nature hesitated to inflict pain.

He concluded her speech for her.

"I who have done so much to make you unhappy. You are right, I have been an instrument in the hands of Fate, and you owe your misery to me. But I am only an instrument, not the original cause. My will had no voice in my actions, and but one motive prompted me. That was duty."

"Duty?" she asked, a smile curling her lip.

"Yes, duty! I could prove it to you, had you the desire to hear me."

She resumed her seat, and said quietly: "I will hear you."

"There was an Indian chief, the son of a Spanish woman. His father was a Seminole. Both are dead. He was reared among his father's people, and learned from them all that Indian youths are taught. Schools then existed among the Seminoles. The white missionaries had established them, and were still at their heads. They had both the ability and the desire to teach. From them Wacora learned all that the pale-faced children are taught. His mind was of his mother's race; his heart inclined to that of his father's."

"But why this difference?" she asked.

"Because the more he knew the more was he convinced of the cruel oppression that had been suffered in all ages. History was a tissue of it. Geography marked its progress. Education only proved that civilization was spread at the expense of honor and of right. This is what the schools taught him."

"That is but one side of the question."

"You are right. So he resolved to make himself familiar with the other. The story of the past might be inapplicable to the events of the present. Believing this, he left the schools, and sought the savanna and the forest. What did he find there? Nothing but the repetition of that past he had read of in books, aggravated by the lawlessness and rapacity of the present. The red-man was ignorant. But did the pale-faces seek to educate him? No! They sought, and still seek, to keep him ignorant, because in his ignorance lies their advantage."

"Was that all the fault of our race?" Alice asked, as she noted the enthusiastic flush upon the speaker's face.

"Not all. That were to argue falsely. The red-man's vices grew greater as the chances of correcting them were denied him. His instinct prompted him to retaliation, for by this he sought to check oppression. 'Twas a vain effort. He found it so, and was forced to practice cruelty. So the quarrel progressed, till today the Indian warrior sees in every white man only an enemy."

"But you? Surely you are not so?"

"I am the Indian chief I have attempted to describe. Take that for your answer."

The young girl was silent.

"If my heart bleeds for suffering, it is my mother's nature pleading within me. I check it because it would be unworthy of a warrior, and the leader of warriors. The storm has arisen. I am carried along with it!"

As he uttered the last words his form seemed to dilate; while his listener stood wondering, as if spellbound.

After a pause, he continued, in a tone more subdued, but still full of feeling.

"If I have caused you unhappiness, think of me as the involuntary instrument. My uncle was beloved by all his tribe—by all our race. His injuries were ours. It was ours to avenge them. And for her"—his voice trembled as he pointed to Sansuta's grave—"she was his only hope and joy upon earth."

Alice Rody's tears flowed over the last resting-place of the Indian maiden. Wacora observed them, and with a delicacy of feeling was about to withdraw from her presence, when she stayed him with a motion of her hand.

For some time neither uttered a word. Alice at length spoke through sobs, which she vainly strove to check or conceal.

"Forgive me!" said she, "for I have done you a great wrong. Much that was dark and terrible, appears now just and natural. I cannot say that I am happier, but I am less troubled than before."

He would have kissed her hand, but with a slight shudder she drew back.

"No, no—do not touch me. Leave me to myself. I shall be more composed by and by."

He obeyed, without saying a word, leaving her alone.

For a long time she sat in the same place, a prey to thoughts she scarce understood.

At length she rose, to all appearance more composed, and tracing the forest path with slow, sad steps, she re-entered the Indian town.

CHAPTER XLI.

A TREACHEROUS BRIDGE.

THERE was one among the Indians who viewed their fair captive with no great favor.

It was Marocota.

His devotion to Oluski had been so blindly true, that in his narrow-minded memory of the old chief's wrongs, he had become bloodthirsty and remorseless. Naturally of a revengeful disposition, he saw in the leniency of both Wacora and Nelatee toward the pale-faced maiden, too much of forgiveness.

This stirred his evil passions to their depth, and he sought for an opportunity to do her an injury.

With a shrewd guess at the truth, he looked upon Cris Carrol's escape as another evidence of that toleration which ill-consorted with his sanguinary hatred of the white race.

He dared not take open measures, but insidiously strove to turn the people of the tribe against their white captive, as well as Wacora.

His success was not commensurate with his wishes. They admired their chief too much to believe anything to his prejudice, and Marocota became himself looked upon as a restless agitator—a subject more zealous than loyal.

He saw accordingly that any injury to the captive must be accomplished by his own agency; the more so as he had already endeavored to excite a feeling of jealousy in Nelatee's mind, of which Alice and Wacora were the objects. The generous youth not only refused belief, but angrily reproved the slanderer for daring to couple his cousin's name with an act so unworthy.

When a person resolves upon mischief, it is astonishing how many opportunities present themselves.

Alice, although unsuspecting of the enmity of which she was the object, avoided Marocota. She did so from a different motive. She knew that it was he who fired the fatal shot at her brother, and could not help regarding the act with abhorrence. His sister—how could she?

And as his sister, how could she look upon his executioner without repugnance—more than repugnance—with horror.

The exigencies of the war had kept Marocota away from the town, and for long periods. But the same causes that brought Wacora back also controlled his return.

He felt that now, if ever, was the time to carry out his schemes of malignity.

He accordingly watched her every movement, among others the many lonely visits she paid to the ruined fort.

Here was the opportunity he wanted, if he could only find the means to avail himself of it.

In a community of red-men, where everything is reduced, even in times of temporary peace, to dull routine, it was not difficult to devise a plan of revenge. But it must be unnoticed to go unpunished, for he had a wholesome dread of Wacora's displeasure, and was not disposed to incur it.

Some days had elapsed since the interview between the chief and his captive, during which time they had seen nothing more of each other.

Wacora, with great delicacy had avoided her, and she had kept herself within the dwelling assigned to her, afraid to meet him, yet pondering deeply over what he had said.

In spite of a natural prejudice against the Indian race, she was startled and wonder-stricken at the nobility of thought and rare talent he had exhibited. She did not doubt but that a portion, at least, of his argument was based on false reasoning, but she was not subtle enough, or perhaps indisposed to detect the erroneous argument. We are very apt to acknowledge the truth of what we admire, while admitting its errors.

Alice Rody was in this predicament.

She had learned to respect the Indian chief, and her respect was tinged with admiration of his many good qualities.

This mental ratiocination had occupied her during the days of her seclusion.

She endeavored to divert her mind to other subjects, and to this end determined to pay another visit to the old fort. She was prompted to it by a thought of having too long forgotten the Indian maiden who slept within the ruin.

It was a glorious morning as she set forth for a walk to the place.

The way was through a belt of timber-land, leading to a creek spanned by a rude wooden bridge. On the other side lay the ruin.

The wood was passed in safety, and she reached the water's edge. To her amazement, she found the creek greatly swollen; this often happened after heavy rains, though she had never before seen it in that condition.

She proceeded along the causeway leading to the bridge, that seemed to offer a safe means of crossing.

She paused to contemplate the current, bearing upon its bosom the torn trunks of trees, caught in its rapid course.

In another moment she was upon the bridge and had got midway over it, when a tremulous motion of the planks caused her to hesitate. As she stood still, the motion ceased, and, smiling at her fears, she again proceeded.

Not far, however. Ere she had made three steps forward, to her horror, the motion recommenced with greater violence.

She saw it was too late to retreat, and sped onward, the planks swagging fearfully toward the water.

Believing it best to proceed, she took courage for a fresh effort, and kept on toward the other side.

It was a fatal resolution.

Just as she had prepared for her last spring, the planks gave way with a crashing sound, and she was precipitated into the stream.

Her presence of mind was gone, and in an instant she was submerged beneath the seething current of the flood.

She rose again, gave utterance to a shriek, and was once more swallowed up, her wail of agony being stifled by the water.

At that moment, a face that expressed fiendish delight appeared through the bushes on the bank. Nor did it vanish until assured that all was over, and Alice Rody had sunk below the surface, never more to return to it alive.

Then, and not till then, the form emerged from out the underwood, and, scrambling to the rude pier from which the planks had parted, a man stood surveying the scene.

It was Marocota!

"Good!" cried he. "So perish all who would make the red-man forgive the injuries of his race. She was the child of a villain, the sister of a fiend!"

He stooped down and examined the broken fragments of the bridge.

"Marocota's ax has done the deed well," said he, continuing his soliloquy; "and he has nothing to fear. Her death will be attributed to accident. It was a great thought, and one that Oluski's spirit will approve. Marocota was his favorite warrior. To please his shade he has done this deed, and will yet do more. Death to the pale-faces, death to their women and children! Death and extermination to the accursed race!"

The vengeful warrior rose from his stooping posture, cast one hurried glance upon the turbulent stream, and, once more entering the underwood, disappeared from the spot.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE STREAM NOT A GRAVE.

WACORA came from the council-chamber, where the warriors had assembled, and passed over to the house where dwelt his white captive.

This was no unusual thing for him when he deemed himself safe from her observation. Upon the day in question, however, he had resolved to see her.

The time had come when active measures were about to be taken by the United States Government in order to "suppress" (such was the term used) the Indians in Florida, and although none could know at that moment how difficult the undertaking would prove, all were alive to the fact that the work was about to commence in earnest.

Information of this had reached the young Seminole chief, and he saw the necessity of removing his tribe from their present residence.

Hence the council, hence also his visit to Alice Rody.

He had determined to lay the facts fully before her, in order that she might name the time of return to her own people.

Can it be wondered at that the young chief heaved a sigh when he thought of the departure of his captive?

Duty and justice, however, both demanded that he should afford her the opportunity, perhaps the only one that might offer amid the troublous times that were approaching.

The noble savage was ready to sacrifice himself for her welfare, and to stifle all selfishness, provided he could make her happy.

"Perhaps," he said hopefully to himself, "she may not wish to leave us. Her near friends are dead, and there may be none she now longs to rejoin. Oh! if it should be so! But I must not think of it. For me there is but one course. I must use no compulsion—she is free to go or stay; and, if she chooses the former, I must submit, though the parting be to me painful as death itself."

Thus reflecting, he walked on toward the house tenanted by his captive.

On arriving at the place he found she was not there. Some children, playing near, told him that she had gone into the woods, and pointed in the direction she had taken.

The young chief hesitated about following her: He was unwilling to thrust himself into her presence at a time she had perhaps devoted to self-communion and repose.

Turning in another direction, he wandered for some time purposelessly, taking no note of the locality, until he had reached the belt of woods which Alice had herself traversed on her road to the old ruin. Wacora, however, entered it at some distance further off from the skirts of the town.

Once under the shadow of the trees, he abated his pace, which had, up to this time, been rapid. Now walking with slow step and abstracted air, he finally stopped and leaned against a huge live-oak, his eyes wandering afar over the silvan scene.

"Here," he soliloquized in thought, "here, away from men and their doings alone is there peace! How my heart sickens at the thought that human ambitions and vanities should pervert man's highest mission, for surely it is peace, turning it into scenes of strife and bloodshed! I, an Indian savage, as white men call me, would gladly lay down this day and forever the rifle and the knife, would willingly bury the war-hatchet, and abandon this sanguinary contest!"

"Could I do so with honor?" he asked, after a pause of reflection. "No! To the end I must now proceed, half assured that my early enthusiasm was but a flash of conscious right, and not the result of reason and knowledge. The people of my mother's race are indeed degenerate; but what of the red-men? Ah! there's a fearful doubt involved in that question, to which I dread to know the answer. Internal feud is already at work among my people. What will it not produce? My only hope is in their courage. That may delay our overthrow, but it cannot be for long. We shall be driven into the impassable swamps, there in misery and despair to enjoy the poor boon of liberty. Pahl! it's but an empty sound. I see the end with a prophetic eye; but I must go on as I've begun, even if my tribe, with all our people, should be swept from the earth! Fool that I've been, to covet the leadership of a forlorn hope!"

At the end of this soliloquy, he stamped the ground with fury. Petty dissensions had arisen among the people he deemed worthy of the highest form of liberty. By this his temper had been chafed, his hopes rudely discouraged. He was but partaking of the enthusiast's fate, finding the real so unlike the ideal. It is the penalty usually paid intelligence when it seeks to reform or better the condition of fallen humanity.

"And she," he continued, in his heart's bitterness, "she can only think of me as a vain savage; vain of the slight superiority education appears to have given me over others of my race. I might as well aspire to make my home among the stars, as in her bosom. She is just as distant, as unlikely to be mine."

In the mood in which the Indian was at that moment, the whole universe seemed leagued against him.

Bitterly he lamented the fate that had given him grand aspirations, while denying him their enjoyment.

As he stood beneath the spreading branches of the live-oak, a double shadow seemed to have fallen upon him—that of his own thoughts, and the tree thickly festooned with its mosses. Both were of somber hue.

He took no heed of the time, and might have stood nursing his bitter thoughts still longer, but for a sound that suddenly startled him from his reverie.

It was a shriek that came ringing through the trees, as if of one in great distress or peril.

The voice was a woman's.

Lover-like, he knew it to be that of Alice Rody.

Without hesitating an instant, he rushed along the path in the direction from which it appeared to come.

In that direction lay the stream. His instinct warned him that the danger was from the water. He remembered the rain-storm just passed. It would be followed by a freshet. Alice Rody may have been caught by it, and was in danger of drowning.

He made these reflections while rushing through the underwood, careless of the thorns that at every step penetrated his skin, covering his garments with blood.

His demeanor had become suddenly changed. The somber shadow on his brow had given place to an air of the wildest excitement. His white captive—she who had made him a captive, was in some strange peril.

He listened as he ran. The swishing of the branches, as he broke through them, hindered him from hearing. No sound reached his ears, but he saw what caused him a strange surprise. It was the form of a man, who, like himself, was making his way through the thicket, only in a different direction. Instead of approaching the creek, the man was going from it; skulking off, as if desirous to shun observation.

For all this Wacora recognized him. He saw it was Marocota. The young chief did not stay to inquire what the warrior was doing there, or why he should be retreating from the stream. He did not even summon the latter to stop. His thoughts were all absorbed by the shriek he had heard, and the danger it denoted. He felt certain it had come from the creek, and if it was the cry of one in the water, there was no time to be lost.

And none was lost; not a moment, for in less than sixty seconds after hearing it, he stood upon the bank of the stream.

As he had anticipated, it was swollen to a flood, its turbid waters carrying upon their whirling surface trunks and torn branches of trees, bunches of reeds, and grass uprooted by the rush of the current. He did not stand to gaze idly upon these. The bridge was above him. The cry had come from there. He saw that it was in ruins. All was explained!

But where was she who had given utterance to that fearful shriek?

He hurried along the edge of the stream, scanning its current from bank to bank, hastily examining every branch and bush borne upon its bosom.

A disk of whitish color came before his eyes. There was something in the water, carried along under the surface. It was the drapery of a woman's dress; and a woman's form was within it!

The young chief stayed not for further scrutiny; but plunging into the flood, and swimming a few strokes, he threw his arms around it.

And he knew that in his arms he held Alice Rody! In a few seconds after, her form lay dripping upon the bank, apparently lifeless!

CHAPTER XLIII.

AT LAST.

WACORA had saved his white captive. She still lived!

The struggle between life and death had been long and doubtful. But life at length triumphed.

For days had she lingered upon the verge of existence, powerless to move from her couch, scarce able to speak. It was some time before she could shape words to thank her deliverer, though she knew who it was. She had been told it was Wacora.

The young chief was unremitting in his attentions, and showed great solicitude for her recovery. He found time, amid the warlike preparations constantly going on, to make frequent calls at her dwelling, and make anxious inquiry about her progress. The nurses who tended on her did not fail to note his anxiety.

Nelatee had been absent, and did not return to the town until she was convalescent. He was grieved to the heart on hearing what had happened.

Wacora, suspecting that Marocota was the guilty one, sought him in every direction. But the vengeful warrior was nowhere to be found. He had fled from the presence of his indignant chief.

It was not until long after that his fate became known. He had been captured in his flight by some of the settlers, and shot, thus dying by the hands of enemies he so hated!

Several weeks elapsed, and no movement had as yet been made by the Government troops. Wacora's tribe still continued to reside in their town undisturbed.

His captive continued to recover, and along with her restored strength came a change over the spirit of her existence. She seemed transformed into a different being.

The past had vanished like a dream. Only dimly did she remember her residence at Tampa bay, her father, the conflict on the hill, the massacre, her brother's sad fate. All seemed to have faded from her memory until they appeared as things that had never been, or of which she had no personal knowledge, but had only heard of them long, long ago.

It is true they still had a shadowy existence in her mind, but entirely disassociated with the events of her life since she had been a captive among the Indians!

Nor was there much to regret in this impaired recollection, for both the events and personages had been among the miseries of her life.

Of her present, she had a more plausible appreciation. She was living a new life, and thinking new thoughts.

Nelatee and Wacora both strove in a thousand kind ways to render her contented and happy. They had no great luxuries to offer her, but such as they had were bestowed with true delicacy.

Strange to say, that in this common solicitude there was not a spark of jealousy between the two cousins!

Nelatee's nature was generosity itself, and self-sacrifice appeared to him as if it was his duty or his fate!

Still, while he basked in the sunshine of the young girl's beauty, he had not the courage to imagine to himself that she could ever belong to another. Not to him might her love be given, but surely not to another! He could not think of that.

True that at times he fancied he could perceive a look bestowed on Wacora such as she never vouchsafed to him—a tremor in her voice when speaking to his cousin which had never betrayed itself in her discourse with himself.

But he might be mistaken. Might? He was certain of it. If she did not love him, at any rate he could not think that she loved Wacora.

Thus did the Indian youth beguile himself. Innocent as a child, he knew little of the heart of woman.

That look, that tremor of the voice, should have told him that she loved Wacora.

Yes, the end had come, and love had conquered. The white maiden was in love with the young Indian chief!

Wacora and his captive—now more than ever his captive—were seated within the ruined fort, near Sansuta's grave.

"You are pleased once more to be here?" he asked.

"I am. During my illness I promised myself, if ever I recovered, that my first visit should be to this spot."

"And yet it was in paying such a visit that you nearly lost your life."

"The life you saved."

"'Twas a happy chance. I cannot tell what led me to the forest on that occasion."

"What were you doing there?" she asked.

"Like the blind mortal that I am, I was blaming myself, and my fate too, when I should have been blessing my fortune."

"For what?"

"For conducting me to the spot where I heard your cry."

"What fortune were you blaming?"

"That which made me unworthy."

"Unworthy of what?"

He did not immediately answer her, but the look he gave caused her to turn her eyes to the ground.

"Do you really wish to know of what I think myself unworthy?"

She smiled as she replied, "If you betray no confidence in telling me."

"None—none but my own."

"Then tell me if you like."

Was it the faint tremor in her voice that emboldened him to proceed?

"Unworthy of you!" was his answer.

"Of me?" she said, her face averted from his.

"Of you, and you only. But why should I withhold further confidence? You have given me courage to speak; have I also your leave?"

She made no answer to the last question, but her look was eloquent of assent.

"I thought on that day," he continued, "that I was accursed by man and Heaven—that I, an Indian savage, was not accounted worthy to indulge in thoughts of love—that love had sprung up within my heart like a pure flower, only to be blighted by the prejudices of race—that all my adoration for the fair and excellent must be kept down by the accident of birth, and that while nurturing a holy passion, I must crush it out and stifle it forever."

"But now?" Her voice was low and tremulous.

"Now all rests upon one word—upon that word depends my happiness or misery, now and forever."

"And what is it?"

"Do not ask it from me! It must come from your eyes, from your lips, from your heart."

There was an eloquence that spoke the answer without a word being uttered.

It was the eloquence of love!

In another instant the lips of the white maiden touched those of her Indian lover!

From their rapturous embrace they were startled by a sound. It was a groan!

It came from the other side of Sansuta's grave, behind which there was a clump of bushes.

Wacora rushed toward the spot, while Alice kept her place, transfixed to it by a terrible presentiment.

The young chief uttered an exclamation of horror as he looked in among the bushes.

His cousin was lying beneath them, stretched out, dead, a dagger, which his right hand still clutched, sheathed in his heart!

With his last groan, and his heart's blood, the generous youth had yielded up his love along with his life!

L'ENVOI.

The Seminole war continued for eight years. Eight years of bloodshed and horror, in which the white man and the Indian struggled for supremacy.

The whites fought for conquest, the Indians to retain possession of their own.

On both sides were acts of cruelty, terrible episodes, illustrating the lex talionis as in all such contests.

The pale-faces were the victors, and the red-men were in time subdued.

Such of the Seminoles as survived the war were allotted lands beyond the Mississippi, and, far distant from their native home, were commanded to be content and happy.

They had no alternative but to submit to this adverse fate, and in several detachments were transported to their new homes.

Of one of the migratory bands who passed through New Orleans, bound west of the Mississippi river, was a young chief who attracted great notice by his commanding presence no less than by a companion seen constantly at his side—a white woman!

She was of great beauty, and those who saw her naturally made inquiry about her name, parentage and station, as also the name of the young chief.

The Indians who were asked simply made answer that the chief was Wacora, and that she by his side was his wife, known among them as "THE WHITE SQUAW."

THE END.

Waverley Library.

- 1 THE MASKED BRIDE. By Mrs. Mary R. Crowell.
- 2 WAS IT LOVE? By Wm. Mason Turner.
- 3 THE GIRL WIFE. By Bartley T. Campbell.
- 4 A BRAVE HEART. By Arabella Southworth.
- 5 BESSIE RAYNOR. By Wm. Mason Turner, M. D.
- 6 THE SECRET MARRIAGE. By Sara Claxton.
- 7 A DAUGHTER OF EVE. By Mrs. Crowell.
- 8 HEART TO HEART. By Arabella Southworth.
- 9 ALONE IN THE WORLD. By author of "Clifton."
- 10 A PAIR OF GRAY EYES. By Rose Kennedy.
- 11 ENTANGLED. By Henrietta Thackeray.
- 12 HIS LAWFUL WIFE. By Mrs. Stephens.
- 13 MADCAP. By Corinne Cushman.
- 14 WHY I MARRIED HIM. By Sara Claxton.
- 15 A FAIR FACE. By Bartley T. Campbell.
- 16 TRUST HER NOT. By Margaret Leicester.
- 17 A LOYAL LOVER. By Arabella Southworth.
- 18 HIS IDOL. By Mrs. Mary Reed Crowell.
- 19 THE BROKEN BETROTHAL. By Mary G. Halpine.
- 20 ORPHAN NELL. By Aggie Penne.
- 21 NOW AND FOREVER. By H. Thackeray.
- 22 THE BRIDE OF AN ACTOR. By the author of "Alone in the World," etc., etc.
- 23 LEAP YEAR. By Sara Claxton.
- 24 HER FACE WAS HER FORTUNE. By E. Blaine.
- 25 ONLY A SCHOOLMISTRESS. By A. Southworth.
- 26 WITHOUT A HEART. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 27 WAS SHE A COQUETTE? By H. Thackeray.
- 28 SYBIL CHASE. By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens.
- 29 FOR HER DEAR SAKE. By Sara Claxton.
- 30 THE BOUQUET GIRL. By Aggie Penne.
- 31 A MAD MARRIAGE. By Mary A. Denison.
- 32 MARIANA, THE PRIMA DONNA. By A. Southworth.
- 33 THE THREE SISTERS. By Alice Fleming.
- 34 A MARRIAGE OF CONVENIENCE. By Sara Claxton.
- 35 ALL AGAINST HER. By Clara Augusta.
- 36 SIR ARCHER'S BRIDE. By Arabella Southworth.
- 37 THE COUNTRY COUSIN. By Rose Kennedy.
- 38 HIS OWN AGAIN. By Arabella Southworth.
- 39 FLIRTATION. By Ralph Royal.
- 40 PLEDGED TO MARRY. By Sara Claxton.
- 41 BLIND DEVOTION. By Alice Fleming.
- 42 BEATRICE, THE BEAUTIFUL. By A. Southworth.
- 43 THE BARONET'S SECRET. By Sara Claxton.
- 44 THE ONLY DAUGHTER. By Alice Fleming.
- 45 HER HIDDEN FOE. By Arabella Southworth.
- 46 THE LITTLE HEIRESS. By M. A. Denison.
- 47 BECAUSE SHE LOVED HIM. By Alice Fleming.
- 48 IN SPITE OF HERSELF. By S. R. Sherwood.
- 49 HIS HEART'S MISTRESS. By Arabella Southworth.
- 50 THE CUBAN HEIRESS. By Mrs. Mary A. Denison.
- 51 TWO YOUNG GIRLS. By Alice Fleming.
- 52 THE WINGED MESSENGER. By Mary Reed Crowell.
- 53 AGNES HOPE. By W. M. Turner, M. D.
- 54 ONE WOMAN'S HEART. By George S. Kaime.
- 55 SHE DID NOT LOVE HIM. By Arabella Southworth.
- 56 LOVE-MAD. By Wm. M. Turner, M. D.
- 57 A BRAVE GIRL. By Alice Fleming.
- 58 THE EBON MASK. By Mary Reed Crowell.
- 59 A WIDOW'S WILES. By Rachel Bernhardt.
- 60 CECIL'S DECEIT. By Jennie Davis Burton.
- 61 A WICKED HEART. By Sara Claxton.
- 62 THE MANIAC BRIDE. By Margaret Blount.
- 63 THE CREOLE SISTERS. By Anna E. Porter.
- 64 WHAT JEALOUSY DID. By Alice Fleming.
- 65 THE WIFE'S SECRET. By Col. Juan Lewis.
- 66 A BROTHER'S SIN. By Rachel Bernhardt.
- 67 FORBIDDEN BANS. By Arabella Southworth.
- 68 WEAVERS AND WEPT. By Mrs. M. E. Braddon.
- 69 CAMILLE. By Alexander Dumas.
- 70 THE TWO ORPHANS. By D'Ennery.
- 71 MY YOUNG WIFE. By My Young Wife's Husband.
- 72 THE TWO WIDOWS. By Annie Thomas.
- 73 ROSE MICHEL. By Maude Hilton.
- 74 CECIL CASTLEMAINE'S GAGE. By Ouida.
- 75 THE BLACK LADY OF DUNA. By J. S. Le Fanu.
- 76 CHARLOTTE TEMPLE. By Mrs. Rowson.
- 77 CHRISTIAN OAKLEY'S MISTAKE. By Miss Mulock.
- 78 MY YOUNG HUSBAND. By Myself.
- 79 A QUEEN AMONGST WOMEN. By the author of "Dora Thorn."
- 80 HER LORD AND MASTER. By Florence Marryat.
- 81 LUCY TEMPLE.
- 82 A LONG TIME AGO. By Meta Orred.
- 83 PLAYING FOR HIGH STAKES. By Annie Thomas.
- 84 THE LAUREL BUSH. By Miss Mulock.
- 85 LED ASTRAY. By Octave Feuillet.
- 86 JANET'S REPENTANCE. By George Eliot.
- 87 ROMANCE OF A POOR YOUNG MAN. By O. Feuillet.
- 88 A TERRIBLE DEED. By Emma G. Jones.
- 89 A GILDED SIN.
- 90 THE AUTHOR'S DAUGHTER. By Mary Howitt.
- 91 THE JILT. By Charles Reade.
- 92 EILEEN ALANNA. By Dennis O'Sullivan.
- 93 LOVE'S VICTORY. By B. L. Farjeon.
- 94 THE QUIET HEART. By Mrs. Oliphant.
- 95 LETTICE ARNOLD. By Mrs. Marsh.
- 96 HAUNTED HEARTS. By Rachel Bernhardt.
- 97 HUGH MELTON. By Catharine King.
- 98 ALICE LEARMONT. By Miss Mulock.
- 99 MARJORIE BRUCE'S LOVER. By Mary Patrick.
- 100 THROUGH FIRE AND WATER. By Fred. Talbot.
- 101 HANNAH. By Miss Mulock.
- 102 PEG WOFFINGTON. By Charles Reade.
- 103 A DESPERATE DEED. By Erskine Boyd.
- 104 SHADOWS ON THE SNOW. By B. L. Farjeon.
- 105 THE GREAT HOGGARTY DIAMOND. By W. M. Thackeray.
- 106 FROM DREAMS TO WAKING. By E. Lynn Linton.
- 107 POOR ZEPH. By F. W. Robinson.
- 108 THE SAD FORTUNES OF THE REV. AMOS BARTON. By George Eliot.
- 109 BREAD-AND-CHEESE AND KISSES. By B. L. Farjeon.
- 110 THE WANDERING HEIR. By C. Reade.
- 111 THE BROTHER'S BET. By E. F. Carlen.
- 112 A HERO. By Miss Mulock.
- 113 PAUL AND VIRGINIA. From the French of Bernardin de St. Pierre.
- 114 'Twas IN TRAFALGAR'S BAY. By Walter Besant and James Rice.
- 115 THE MAID OF KILLEENA. By William Black.
- 116 HETTY. By Henry Kingsley.
- 117 THE WAYSIDE CROSS. By Capt. E. A. Milman.
- 118 THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. By Oliver Goldsmith.
- 119 MAUD MOHAN. By Annie Thomas.
- 120 THADDEUS OF WARSAW. By Miss Jane Porter.
- 121 THE KING OF NO-LAND. By B. L. Farjeon.
- 122 LOVEL THE WIDOWER. By W. M. Thackeray.
- 123 AN ISLAND PEARL. By B. L. Farjeon.
- 124 COUSIN PHILLIS.

- 125 LEILA; OR, THE SIEGE OF GRENADA. By Edward Bulwer, (Lord Lytton.)
- 126 WHEN THE SHIP COMES HOME. By Walter Besant and James Rice.
- 127 ONE OF THE FAMILY. By James Payn.
- 128 THE BIRTHRIGHT. By Mrs. Gore.
- 129 MOTHERLESS; OR, THE FARMER'S SWEETHEART. By Colonel Prentiss Ingraham.
- 130 HOMELESS; OR, THE TWO ORPHAN GIRLS IN NEW YORK. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 131 SISTER AGAINST SISTER; OR, THE RIVALRY OF HEARTS. By Mrs. Mary Reed Crowell.
- 132 SOLD FOR GOLD; OR, ALMOST LOST. By Mrs. M. V. Victor.
- 133 LORD ROTH'S SIN; OR, BETROTHED AT THE CRADLE. By Mrs. Georgiana Dickens.
- 134 DID HE LOVE HER? By Bartley T. Campbell.
- 135 SINNED AGAINST; OR, ALMOST IN HIS POWER. By Lillian Lovejoy.
- 136 WAS SHE HIS WIFE? By Mary Reed Crowell.
- 137 THE VILLAGE ON THE CLIFF. By Miss Thackeray.
- 138 POOR VALERIA. By Margaret Blount.
- 139 MARGARET GRAHAM. By G. P. R. James.
- 140 WITHOUT MERCY. By Bartley T. Campbell.
- 141 HONOR BOUND. By Lillian Lovejoy.
- 142 FLEEING FROM LOVE. Mrs. Harriet Irving.
- 143 ABDUCTED. By Rett Winwood.
- 144 A STRANGE MARRIAGE. By Lillian Lovejoy.
- 145 TWO GIRLS' LIVES. By Mrs. Mary Reed Crowell.
- 146 A DESPERATE VENTURE. By Arabella Southworth.
- 147 THE WAR OF HEARTS. By Corinne Cushman.
- 148 WHICH WAS THE WOMAN? By Sara Claxton.
- 149 AN AMBITIOUS GIRL. By Frances H. Davenport.
- 150 LOVE LORD OF ALL. By Alice May Fleming.
- 151 A WILD GIRL. By Corinne Cushman.
- 152 A MAN'S SACRIFICE. By Harriet Irving.
- 153 DID SHE SIN? By Mrs. Mary Reed Crowell.
- 154 HE LOVES ME NOT. By Lillian Lovejoy.
- 155 WINNING WAYS. By Margaret Blount.
- 156 WHAT SHE COST HIM. By Arabella Southworth.
- 157 A GIRL'S HEART. By Rett Winwood.
- 158 A BITTER MISTAKE. By Agnes Mary Shelton.
- 159 LADY HELEN'S VOW. By the late Mrs. E. F. Ellet.
- 160 BUYING A HEART. By Lillian Lovejoy.
- 161 PEARL OF PEARLS. By A. P. Morris, Jr.
- 162 A FATEFUL GAME. By Sara Claxton.
- 163 THE CREOLE COUSINS. By Philip S. Warne.
- 164 A S-A-HING O' DEAL. By Georgiana Dickens.
- 165 A STRANGE GIRL. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 166 A MAN'S SIN. By Rett Winwood.
- 167 THE HAND OF FATE. By Arabella Southworth.
- 168 TWO FAIR WOMEN. By Wm. Mason Turner.
- 169 TEMPTED THROUGH LOVE. By Lillian Lovejoy.
- 170 BLIND BARBARA'S SECRET. By Mary G. Halpine.
- 171 A WOMAN'S WITCHERY. By Sara Claxton.
- 172 BLACK EYES AND BLUE. By Corinne Cushman.
- 173 THE COST OF A FOLLY. By Georgiana Dickens.
- 174 THE PRETTY PURITAN. By A. Parson's Daughter.
- 175 IS LOVE A MOCKERY? By Arabella Southworth.
- 176 ADRIA, THE ADOPTED. By Jennie Davis Burton.
- 177 FOR THE WOMAN HE LOVED. By Agnes Mary Shelton.
- 178 THE LOCKED HEART. By Corinne Cushman.
- 179 PARTED BY TREACHERY. By Harriet Irving.
- 180 WAS SHE A WIFE? By Rett Winwood.
- 181 UNDER A CLOUD. By Sara Claxton.
- 182 AN AMERICAN QUEEN. By Grace Mortimer.
- 183 A POINT OF HONOR. By Lillian Lovejoy.
- 184 PURSUED TO THE ALTAR. By Corinne Cushman.
- 185 PUT TO A TEST. By Georgiana Dickens.
- 186 THE TERRIBLE TRUTH. By Jennie Davis Burton.
- 187 OTTITWITTED BY HERSELF. By Arabella Southworth.
- 188 FLORETTE. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 189 HER GUARDIAN'S SACRIFICE. By Sara Claxton.
- 190 PRETTY AND PROUD. By Corinne Cushman.
- 191 A WOMAN'S MANUEVER. By Lillian Lovejoy.
- 192 THE BITTER FEUD. By Jennie Davis Burton.
- 193 BREAKING THE FETTERS. By Georgiana Dickens.
- 194 THE MYSTERIOUS GUARDIAN. By Corinne Cushman.
- 195 IN THE BALANCE. By Arabella Southworth.
- 196 JULE, THE JEWESS. By Dr. Noel Dunbar.
- 197 A SISTER'S CRIME. By Agnes Mary Shelton.
- 198 WILMA WILDE. By Jennie Davis Burton.
- 199 THE BEAUTIFUL DEMON. By Francis Helen Davenport.
- 200 MADLEY BEECHES. By Corinne Cushman.
- 201 A YOUNG GIRL'S ORDEAL. By Sara Claxton.
- 202 HER EVIL GENIUS. By Harriet Irving.
- 203 PASSION'S REPRISAL. By Lillian Lovejoy.
- 204 ELEGANT EGBERT. By Philip S. Warne.
- 205 A MINISTERING ANGEL. By Georgiana Dickens.
- 206 OUIDA'S LOVE. By Henriette E. De Conde.
- 207 A HASTY MARRIAGE. By Mrs. M. L. Fordham.
- 208 BOWIE, THE KNIGHT OF CHIVALRY. By Philip S. Warne.
- 209 CHERRY. By Arabella Southworth.
- 210 CARLYON'S YEAR. By James Payn.
- 211 AN IDOL OF CLAY. By Harriet Irving.
- 212 THE LADDER OF LIFE. By Amelia B. Edwards.

A new issue every week.

For sale by all Newsdealers, price five cents each, or sent, postage paid, on receipt of six cents.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, Publishers,
98 William street, N. Y.

THE

Sunnyside Library

- 1 LALLA ROOKH. By Thomas Moore..... 10c
- 2 DON JUAN. By Lord Byron .. 20c
- 3 PARADISE LOST. By John Milton 10c
- 4 THE LADY OF THE LAKE. Sir Walter Scott... 10c
- 5 LUCILE. By Owen Meredith... 10c
- 6 UNDRINE; OR, THE WATER-SPIRIT. From the German of Friederich De La Motte Fouque... 10c

For sale by all newsdealers, or sent, postage paid, on receipt of twelve cents for single numbers, double numbers twenty-four cents.

ADAMS, VICTOR & CO., Publishers,
98 William street, N. Y.

BEADLE'S DIME LIBRARY.

- 1 A Hard Crowd. By Philip S. Warne.
- 2 The Dare-Devil. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 3 Kit Carson, Jr. By Buckskin Sam.
- 4 The Kidnapper. By Philip S. Warne.
- 5 The Fire-Flends. By A. P. Morris.
- 6 Wildcat Bob. By Edward L. Wheeler.
- 7 Death-Notch. By Oil Coomes.
- 8 The Headless Horseman. A strange story of Texas. By Captain Mayne Reid.
- 9 Handy Andy. By Samuel Lover.
- 10 Vidocq, the French Police Spy. Written by Himself.
- 11 Wildshipman Easy. By Captain Marryat.
- 12 The Death-Shot. By Captain Mayne Reid.
- 13 Pathaway. By Dr. J. H. Robinson.
- 14 Thayendagea. By Ned Buntline.
- 15 The Tiger-Slayer. By Gustave Aimard.
- 16 The White Wizard. By Ned Buntline.
- 17 Nightshade. By Dr. J. H. Robinson.
- 18 The Sea Bandit. By Ned Buntline.
- 19 Red Cedar. By Gustave Aimard.
- 20 The Bandit at Bay. By Gustave Aimard.
- 21 The Trapper's Daughter. By G. Aimard.
- 22 Whitelaw. By Dr. J. H. Robinson.
- 23 The Red Warrior. By Ned Buntline.
- 24 The Prairie Flower. By G. Aimard.
- 25 The Gold Guide. By Francis Johnson.
- 26 The Bath-Track. By Francis Johnson.
- 27 The Spotter Detective. By A. W. Aiken.
- 28 Three-Fingered Jack. By J. E. Badger.
- 29 Tiger Dick, the Faro King. By P. S. Warne.
- 30 Gospel George. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 31 The New York Shark. By A. W. Aiken.
- 32 Boys of Yale. By J. D. Vose.
- 33 Overland Kit. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 34 Rocky Mountain Rob. By A. W. Aiken.
- 35 Kentuck, the Sport. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 36 Injun Dick. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 37 Hiri, the Hunchback. By Dr. J. H. Robinson.
- 38 Velvet Hand. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 39 The Russian Spy. By Fred. Whittaker.
- 40 The Long Haired 'Pards.' By Joseph E. Badger, Jr.
- 41 Gold Dan. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 42 The California Detective. By Aiken.
- 43 Dikota Dan. By Oil Coomes.
- 44 Old Dan Backback. By Oil Coomes.
- 45 Old Bull's Eye. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 46 Bowie-Knife Ben. By Oil Coomes.
- 47 Pacific Pete. By Joseph E. Badger, Jr.
- 48 Idaho Tom. By Oil Coomes.
- 49 The Wolf Demon. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 50 Jack Rabbit. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 51 Red Rob. By Oil Coomes.
- 52 The Death Trailer. By Buffalo Bill.
- 53 Silver Sam. By Col. Delle Sara.
- 54 Always On Hand. By Philip S. Warne.
- 55 The Scalp Hunters. By Capt. Mayne Reid.
- 56 The Indian Mazepa. By A. W. Aiken.
- 57 The Silent Hunter. By Percy B. St. John.
- 58 Silver Knife. By Dr. J. H. Robinson.
- 59 The Man From Texas. By A. W. Aiken.
- 60 Wide Awake. By Frank Dumont.
- 61 Captain Seawall. By Ned Buntline.
- 62 Loyal Heart. By Gustave Aimard.
- 63 The Winged Whale. By A. W. Aiken.
- 64 Double-Sight. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 65 The Red Rajah. By Capt. F. Whittaker.
- 66 The Specter Barque. By Mayne Reid.
- 67 The Boy Jockey. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 68 The Fighting Trapper. By Captain J. F. C. Adams.
- 69 The Irish Captain. By Capt. F. Whittaker.
- 70 Hydrabad. By Dr. J. H. Robinson.
- 71 Captain Cool-Blade. By Jos. E. Badger.
- 72 The Phantom Hand. By A. W. Aiken.
- 73 The Knight of the Red Cross. By Dr. J. H. Robinson.
- 74 Captain of the Rifles. By Mayne Reid.
- 75 Gentleman George. By A. W. Aiken.
- 76 The Queen's Musketeers. By G. Albony.
- 77 The Fresh of Frisco. By A. W. Aiken.
- 78 The Mysterious Spy. By A. M. Grainger.
- 79 Joe Phenix, Police Spy. By A. W. Aiken.
- 80 A Man of Nerve. By Philip S. Warne.
- 81 The Human Tiger. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 82 Iron Wrist. By Col. T. H. Monstery.
- 83 The Cold Bullet Sport. By Buffalo Bill.
- 84 Hunted Down. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 85 The Cretan Rover. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 86 The Big Hunter. By the author of "Silent Hunter."
- 87 The Scarlet Captain. By Col. Delle Sara.
- 88 Big George. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 89 The Pirate Prince. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 90 Wild Will. By Buckskin Sam.
- 91 The Winning Oar. By A. W. Aiken.
- 92 Buffalo Bill. By Major Dangerfield Burr.
- 93 Captain Dick Talbot. By A. W. Aiken.
- 94 Freelance, the Buccaneer. By P. Ingraham.
- 95 Azhort, the Axman. By A. P. Morris.
- 96 Double-Death. By Capt. Fred. Whittaker.
- 97 Bronze Jack. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 98 The Rock Rider. By Capt. F. Whittaker.
- 99 The Giant Rifleman. By Oil Coomes.
- 100 The French Spy. By A. P. Morris.
- 101 The Man From New York. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 102 The Masked Band. By Geo. L. Aiken.
- 103 Merle, the Mutineer. By Col. Ingraham.
- 104 Montezuma, the Merciless. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 105 Dan Brown of Denver. By Joseph E. Badger, Jr.
- 106 Shamus O'Brien. By Col. Delle Sara.
- 107 Richard Talbot of Cinnabar. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 108 The Duke of Diamonds. By Captain Frederick Whittaker.
- 109 Captain Kyd. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 110 The Silent Rifleman. By H. W. Herbert.
- 111 The Smuggler Captain. By N. Buntline.
- 112 Joe Phenix, the Private Detective. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 113 The Sea Sipper. By J. H. Ingraham.
- 114 The Gentleman From Pike. By P. S. Warne.
- 115 The Severed Head. By Capt. Whittaker.
- 116 Black Plume. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 117 Dashing Dandy. By Dangerfield Burr.
- 118 The Burglar Captain. By Prof. J. H. Ingraham.
- 119 Alabama Joe. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 120 The Texan Spy. By N. M. Curtis.
- 121 The Sea Cadet. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 122 Saul Sabberday. By Ned Buntline.
- 123 Alapaha, the Squaw. By F. Johnson.
- 124 Assowaum, the Avenger; or, The Doom of the Destroyer. By Francis Johnson.
- 125 The Blacksmith Outlaw; or, Merry England. By Harrison Ainsworth.
- 126 The Demon Duellist. By Col. Monstery.
- 127 Sol Scott. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 128 The Chevalier Corsair. By the author of "Merle, the Mutineer."
- 129 Mississippi Mose. By Edward Willett.
- 130 Captain Volcano. By A. W. Aiken.
- 131 Buckskin Sam. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 132 Nemo, King of the Tramps. By Capt. Frederick Whittaker.
- 133 Rody, the Rover. By W. Carleton.
- 134 Darkie Dan. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 135 The Bush Ranger. By F. Johnson.
- 136 The Outlaw-Hunter. By F. Johnson.
- 137 Long Beard. By Oil Coomes.
- 138 The Border Bandits. By F. Johnson.
- 139 Fire-Eye. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 140 The Three Spaniards. By Geo. Walker.
- 141 Equinox Tom. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 142 Captain Crimson. By Dangerfield Burr.
- 143 The Czar's Spy. By Col. T. H. Monstery.
- 144 The Hunchback of Notre-Dame. By Victor Hugo.
- 145 Pistol Pards. By Wm. R. Eyster.
- 146 The Doctor Detective. By G. Lemuel.
- 147 Gold Spur. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 148 One-Armed Alf. By Oil Coomes.
- 149 The Border Rifles. By Gustave Aimard.
- 150 El Rubio Bravo. By Col. Monstery.
- 151 The Freebooters. By Gustave Aimard.
- 152 Captain Ironnerve. By Marmaduke Dey.
- 153 The White Scalper. By Gustave Aimard.
- 154 Joaquin, the Saddle King. By J. E. Badger.
- 155 The Corsair Queen. By Col. Ingraham.
- 156 Velvet Face. By Major Dangerfield Burr.
- 157 Mourad, the Mameluke. By Colonel Thomas Hoyer Monstery.
- 158 The Doom'd Dozen. By Dr. F. Powell.
- 159 Red Rudger. By Capt. Fred. Whittaker.
- 160 Soft Hand, Sharp. By Wm. R. Eyster.
- 161 The Wolves of New York. By Aiken.
- 162 The Mad Mariner. By Col. Ingraham.
- 163 Ben Brion. By Dr. J. H. Robinson.
- 164 The King's Fool. By C. Dunning Clark.
- 165 Joaquin, the Terrible. By J. E. Badger, Jr.
- 166 Owlet, the Robber Prince. By S. R. Urban.
- 167 The Man of Steel. By A. P. Morris.
- 168 Wild Bill. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 169 Corporal Cannon. By Col. Monstery.
- 170 Sweet William. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 171 Tiger Dick, the Man of the Iron Heart. By Philip S. Warne.
- 172 The Black Pirate. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 173 California John. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 174 Phantom Knights. By Capt. Whittaker.
- 175 Wild Bill's Trump Card. By Major Dangerfield Burr.
- 176 Lady Jaguar. By Captain Mark Wilton.
- 177 Don Diablo. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 178 Dark Dashwood. By Major Sam S. Hall.
- 179 Conrad, the Convict. By Prof. Stewart Gildersleeve, LL. D.
- 180 Old '49. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 181 The Scarlet Schooner. By P. Ingraham.
- 182 Hands Up! By Wm. R. Eyster.
- 183 Gilbert, the Guide. By C. D. Clark.
- 184 The Ocean Vampire. By Col. Ingraham.
- 185 The Man Spider. By A. P. Morris.
- 186 The Black Bravo. By Buckskin Sam.
- 187 The Death's Head Cuirassiers. By Captain Frederick Whittaker.
- 188 The Phantom Mazepa. By Major Dangerfield Burr.
- 189 Wild Bill's Gold Trail. By Ingraham.
- 190 The Three Guardsmen. By Alex. Dumas.
- 191 The Terrible Tonkaway. By Buckskin Sam.
- 192 The Lightning Sport. By W. R. Eyster.
- 193 The Man in Red. By Capt. Whittaker.
- 194 Don Sombrero. By Capt. Mark Wilton.
- 195 The Lone Star Gambler. By Buckskin Sam.
- 196 La Marmoset, the Detective Queen. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 197 Revolver Rob. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 198 The Skeleton Schooner. By Colonel Prentiss Ingraham.
- 199 Diamond Dick. By Buckskin Sam.
- 200 The Rifle Rangers. By Captain Mayne Reid.
- 201 The Pirate of the Placers. By Joseph E. Badger, Jr.
- 202 Cactus Jack. By Capt. Mark Wilton.
- 203 The Double Detective. By A. W. Aiken.
- 204 Big Foot Wallace. By Buckskin Sam.
- 205 The Gambler Pirate. By Col. Ingraham.
- 206 One Eye, the Cannoneer. By F. Whittaker.
- 207 Old Hard Head. By Philip S. Warne.
- 208 The White Chief. By Capt. Mayne Reid.
- 209 Buck Farley. By Edward Willett.
- 210 Buccaneer Bess. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 211 The Unknown Sport. By F. Whittaker.
- 212 The Brazos Tigers. By Buckskin Sam.
- 213 The War Trail. By Capt. Mayne Reid.
- 214 The Two Cool Sports. By W. R. Eyster.
- 215 Parson Jim. By Captain F. Whittaker.
- 216 The Corsair Planter. By P. Ingraham.
- 217 The Serpent of El Paso. By Buckskin Sam.
- 218 The Wild Huntress. By Capt. Mayne Reid.
- 219 The Scorpion Brothers. By Captain Mark Wilton.
- 220 The Specter Yacht. By Col. Ingraham.
- 221 Desperate Duke. By Buckskin Sam.
- 222 Bill, the Blizzard. By Edward Willett.
- 223 Canyon Dave. By Captain Mark Wilton.
- 224 Black Beard. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 225 Rocky Mountain Al. By Buckskin Sam.
- 226 The Mad Hussars. By Capt. Whittaker.
- 227 Buckshot Ben. By Capt. Mark Wilton.
- 228 The Maroon. By Capt. Mayne Reid.
- 229 Captain Cutsleeve. By Wm. R. Eyster.
- 230 The Flying Dutchman of 1880. By Capt. Frederick Whittaker.
- 231 The Kid Glove Miner; or, The Magic Doctor of Golden Gulch. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 232 Orson Oxx, the Man of Iron. By Isaac Hawks, Ex-Detective.
- 233 The Old Boy of Tombstone; or, Wagering a Life on a Card. By J. E. Badger.
- 234 The Hunters' Feast. By Captain Mayne Reid.
- 235 Red Lightning, the Man of Chance. By Colonel Prentiss Ingraham.
- 236 Champion Sam. By Col. T. H. Monstery.
- 237 Long-Haired Max; or, The Black League of the Coast. By Captain Mark Wilton.
- 238 Hank Hound, the New Orleans Detective. By A. P. Morris.
- 239 The Terrible Trio. By Buckskin Sam.
- 240 A Cool Head; or, Orson Oxx in Peril. By Isaac Hawks, Ex-Detective.
- 241 Spitfire Saul, King of the Rustlers. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 242 The Fog Devil; or, The Skipper of the Flash. By Capt. Fred. Whittaker.
- 243 The Pilgrim Sharp; or, The Soldier's Sweetheart. By Buffalo Bill.
- 244 Merciless Mart, the Man-Tiger of Missouri. By Buckskin Sam.
- 245 Barranca Bill, the Revolver Champion. By Captain Mark Wilton.
- 246 Queen Helen, the Amazon of the Overland. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 247 Alligator Ike; or, The Secret of the Everglades. By Captain Fred. Whittaker.
- 248 Montana Nat. By Edward Willett.
- 249 Elephant Tom, of Durango; or, Your Gold-Dust or Your Life. By J. E. Badger, Jr.
- 250 The Rough Riders; or, Sharp-Eye, the Seminole Scourge. By Buckskin Sam.
- 251 Tiger Dick vs. Iron Despard; or, Every Man Has His Match. By P. S. Warne.
- 252 The Wall Street Blood; or Tick Tick, the Telegraph Detective. By Albert W. Aiken.
- 253 A Yankee Cossack; or, The Queen of the Nihilists. By Capt. Frederick Whittaker.
- 254 Giant Jake, the Patrol of the Mountain. By Newton M. Curtis.
- 255 The Pirate Priest. By Col. P. Ingraham.
- 256 Double Dan, the Dastard. By Buckskin Sam.
- 257 Death-Trap Diggings; or, A Hard Man from 'Way Back. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr.
- 258 Bullet Head, the Colorado Bravo. By Captain Mark Wilton.
- 259 Cutlass and Cross; or, The Ghouls of the Sea. By Col. Prentiss Ingraham.
- 260 The Masked Mystery; or, The Black Crescent. By A. P. Morris.
- 261 Black Sam, the Prairie Thunderbolt. By Col. Jo Yards, ("Virginia Jo.")
- 262 Fighting Tom; or, The Terror of the Troughs. By Col. T. H. Monstery.
- 263 Iron-Armed Abe, the Huncnoack Destroyer. By Capt. Mark Wilton.
- 264 The Crooked Three. By Buckskin Sam.
- 265 Old Double-Sword; or, Pilots and Pirates. By Captain Fred. Whittaker.
- 266 Leopard Luke, the King of Horse-Thieves. By Capt. Mark Wilton.
- 267 The White Squaw. By Capt. Mayne Reid.
- 268 Magic Mike, the Man of Frills. By Wm. R. Eyster.
- 269 The Bayou Bravo. By Buckskin Sam.

A new issue every week.

Beadle's Dime Library is for sale by all Newsdealers, ten cents per copy, or sent by mail on receipt of twelve cents each. BEADLE & ADAMS, Publishers 93 William Street, New York.